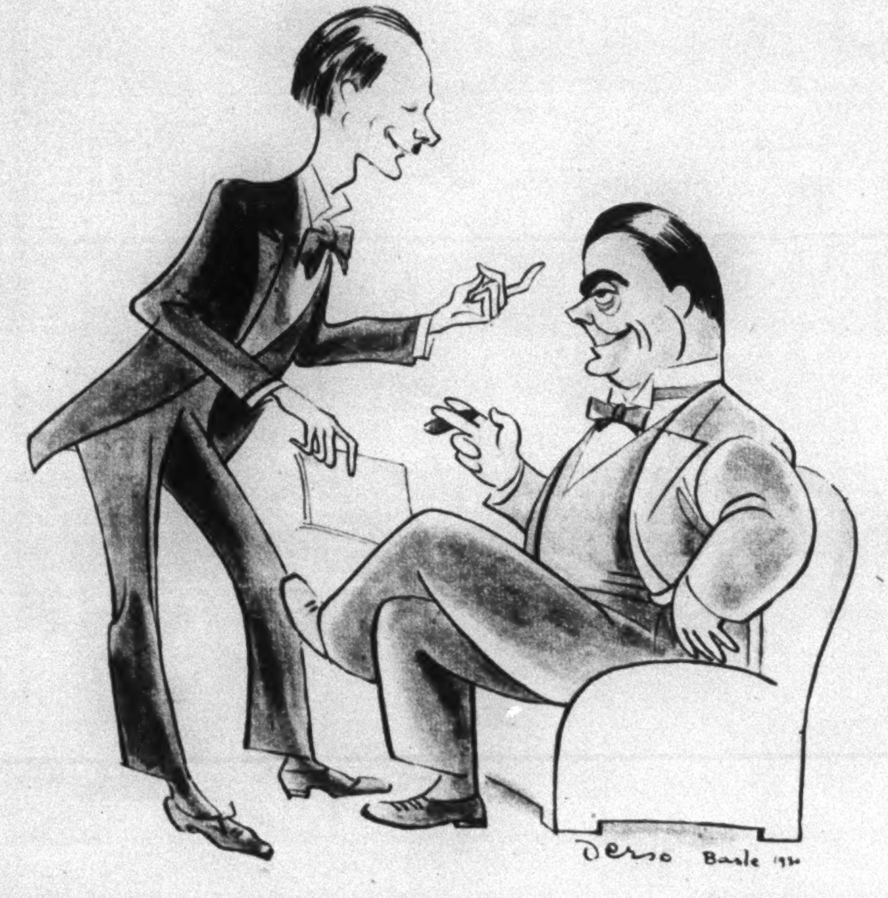
The tourist comes out of the imposing union railway station that reflects the cross-roads importance of Basle. He looks over a sunbright square that seems brighter for its flowers and for its contrast with a park seen between the other two sides walled with hotels. He gets into a taxicab as the quickest and surest way of finding the bank. He ends up just diagonally across the street from where he started, at one section of the wall of five-story buildings. A section with a façade that puzzles: Is it concrete looking like granite or granite looking like concrete? It is a modernish gray façade, distinguished chiefly by its anonymity.

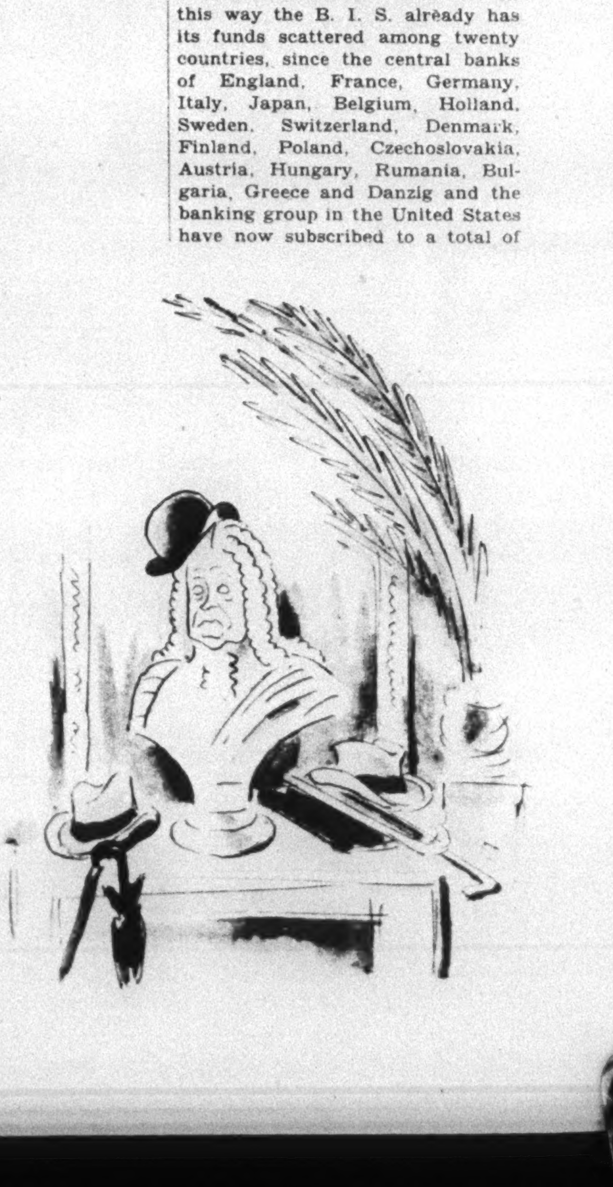


Pierre Quesnay, Youthful General Manager, and Leon Fraser, Vice President.

The visitor enters and searches in vain for the counter with its grill, its caged-in tellers and cashiers passing money out or drawing it in. He listens in vain for the sound of an adding machine or a typewriter. He looks in vain for some one with the appearance of having some money to deposit. The only person likely to bring anything into this bank to deposit is a messenger boy. The messenger boys of Basle apparently do not think it is safe to leave their bicycles outside this institution. They bring them inside and stow them in an aisle.

What the visitor enters is a hall that looks like the lobby of one of these European "confort moderne" hotels that has the ambition of getting the Guide Michelin to give it a higher rating in the next edition. A fragile table to the left of the entrance, another to the right, a flimsy little table in front with an expectantly clean brass ash tray, a few unstuffed, spindly chairs, two sofas backed against marble fireplaces on either side, a single writing table in the corner with a partition across the top to make it serve for two. This is all the furniture and it looks distinctly of a "confort-moderne" brand.

Even so the lobby, which is 30 by 20 feet large, has an empty air. Some one has noticed this and decided that the one thing on the walls, a rather garish color-print advertising calendar, needed supplementary art. And so a plaster bust of Beatrice sits on one mantel and looks coldly at the plaster bust of a gentleman of the eighteenth century, doubtfully identified as Necker, who keeps a sallow eye on the door.



Necker's Bust Keeps a Sallow Eye on the Door.

Then some one else decided that what the lobby needed was a bit of life. He put two big potted palmetto palms to greet with drooping arms the entering visitor. At the base of one palm he added the kind of vine that old ladies like to keep in bay-windows. Before he could garnish the other the chaste Beatrice caught his eye and he obligingly put a baby fig tree in handy reach on either side. Then something called him away and he never returned.

Looking at all this, the visitor finally discovers a fellow-man, the concierge, partly hidden in his cubby-hole behind one of the weeping palms. As the visitor watches, most of the few persons who come and go, either get a key from the great rack of room keys behind the concierge or leave one with him. The hotel illusion is complete. It is not surprising, perhaps, that it is. The bank, like the League of Nations, had to start business in whatever building it could find and converted a hotel to its needs.

Starting from scratch only two months ago, the bank has had to move in, hire and organize its present staff of fifty persons, start handling reparations payments, float a $300,000,000 reparations loan in nine countries and issue four-fifths of its $100,000,000 capital stock—all in less than two months. It has done this and found time also to decide that its investment policy will be one of extreme liquidity and to prod Yugoslavia and Portugal into stabilizing their currencies. It has done its work so well that central banks all over the world are asking it to sell them some capital stock. With the staff still working frequently till midnight on such pressing business, there has been little time for keeping up appearances.

It is probable that the bank will never look like a bank to most people. It has no need for a counter; because it has no over-the-counter business. It needs no huge vault or elaborate burglar alarm apparatus, for it keeps no cash on the premises. By a curious paradox the depositor does not leave his cash with this bank; the bank banks its deposits with its depositors. Its depositors are all banks themselves, national central banks except in America where the place the Federal Reserve Board refused has been taken by a banking group. The bank's clients are all stockholders and all the important ones are members of its board of directors.

One must always keep that in mind on reading such things as the recent announcement that Germany has "paid" the bank $30,000,000, the regular monthly instalment of its reparations annuity. Germany did not hand the bank a wad of bills or a few sacks of gold or even a check. The Reichsbank merely notified the bank that it had credited its account with $30,000,000. The bank then notified those of its clients who are entitled to receive reparations—such as the Bank of France and the Bank of England—that it was holding at their disposal in the Reichsbank their shares of the payment. If any of these clients does not want to draw out its share immediately—say for fear that the transfer might upset currency exchanges—its account with the bank is credited with the amount in question. The money itself thus remaining in the vaults of the Reichsbank, is not to the credit of the reparations creditor, but to the credit of his banker, the International Bank. Since no bank leaves idle the funds of its depositors but invests them profitably, the International Bank uses this credit with the Reichsbank to buy securities, which it can dispose of whenever its depositors draw on their accounts.

THE B. I. S., as it is usually called in English (B. R. I. is the French and B. I. Z. the German abbreviation of its long title), follows similar procedure with the banks that have subscribed to a portion of its capital stocks. These banks send no money to Basle in payment of this stock; they merely credit the B. I. S. with the amount or, to put it in another way, the B. I. S. debits their account with it. In this way the B. I. S. already has its funds scattered among twenty countries, since the central banks of England, France, Germany, Italy, Japan, Belgium, Holland, Sweden, Switzerland, Denmark, Finland, Poland, Czechoslovakia, Austria, Hungary, Rumania, Bulgaria, Greece and Danzig and the banking group in the United States have now subscribed to a total of

HUMANIZING THE STORE DUMMIES OF PARIS

Engaging Wax Figures of Popular Characters in Show Windows Arouse the Wide Favor of An Admiring French Public

PARIS.

IT is a little startling, when one goes promenading in Paris, to meet some familiar figure standing in a doorway. Often the countenance is so well known that recognition is immediate; sometimes it starts the mind searching for the name. More than likely the visitor is tempted to introduce himself—to put out his hand and exclaim, "Why, Colonel Lindbergh! I have wanted to meet you for a long time."

Colonel Lindbergh is not alone among popular wax manikins of the Paris clothing stores. He is shown as a youthful and smiling Lindbergh, instead of the graver personality that the American public has come to know. Paris remembers him for his smile, faithfully reproduced in wax. The manikin makers affirm that his slender figure is exactly suited for demonstrating the proper hang of a double-breasted coat.

For a time the Prince of Wales enjoyed parity with Colonel Lindbergh, but lately he has lost favor. It seems that the men's clothing of many nations is largely selected by madam or mademoiselle. When one or the other finds a suit to her taste she drags monsieur to the store. And the clothing merchants and the manikin makers have discovered that the women of the world buy their men folk's clothing largely by reason of the manikins that display it.

With this bit of practical psychology in mind, it becomes possible to understand something of the Prince's decline. According to the manikin experts, two factors have hurt his standing. First, his many falls from horses, which have caused the gentler sex to wonder if he really is a story book prince. Second, the reports from time to time that he never would marry.

COLONEL LINDBERGH is not the only person in American life who has found fame in wax. And the fact that this kind of fame can be enduring is attested by the continuing demand for manikins of Rudolph Valentino. How many famous men have passed on and been forgotten since Valentino's death? Yet he retains a distinctive place in the pantheon of wax. Practically every country of the globe sends its orders to Paris for likenesses of Valentino. Clothing merchants everywhere find that the coat shown upon the actor's figure will frequently sell faster than any other.

Another favorite of the Paris doorways is that ornament of the cinemas, Adolphe Menjou, wearing one of his dignified expressions, with the far-away look in the eyes. He follows Colonel Lindbergh and Valentino on the score of popularity. The experts hold that he always should be exhibited in a morning coat or a tuxedo, preferably the latter, because he has one of the world's best tuxedo figures. They say that he looks well enough in a morning coat, but such a coat really should be worn by a taller man. In a tuxedo—incomparable!

A fourth personality well known to Americans, who has reached the degree of fame at which a man may become a model for a manikin, is Maurice Chevalier. His place in this pantheon rivals that of Menjou. Menjou has enjoyed his popularity longer, but Chevalier is distinctly a rising star. The figures of Chevalier have a singularly lifelike expression about the eyes, a mocking, challenging expression.

The manikin makers have received letters from women in many lands, asking for miniature reproductions of the three actors' figures, as seen in clothing stores.

In the case of Colonel Lindbergh the manikin makers say that the psychology at work is different from that inspired by the movie stars. While he enjoys abundant admiration from the fair sex, he remains the hero unequaled in the eyes of small boys. Every one would like to be a Lindbergh. And the first time one of this host puts on his first long trousers he chooses a suit like the one he saw in the window worn by Colonel Lindbergh.

The Paris manikin trade is large and prosperous. For years the city has been the admitted centre of this practical art—it has clearly become an art, and one now carried to a degree of perfection that is surprising. Until the last year or two Americans have been accustomed to see impossibly handsome young men in their clothing stores, wearing the last cut of fashion and an ethereal look. The Paris makers have gone far beyond that point, humanizing the manikins both as to countenance and form. Working either in wax or the new cerolaque, they have approached human likeness amazingly.

A Dummy Chevalier Gazes at the Passing Throng.

The models are created by trained sculptors. More than one recognized man of the time has fashioned models for the Paris manikin makers. These names are whispered about the manikin ateliers. Also, it is whispered, some of them still work in this clay when art fails to yield a living—as it often does.

Once a model is complete it is reproduced by casting just as a piece of bronze would be founded. Unnumbered figures can be reproduced. The wax kind have natural hair, any shade desired; the cerolaque have "carved hair." The shading is carefully reproduced in the portrait manikins and even the "part" of the hair is studiously followed.

More than one personality of the day has posed for the sculptors who fashion the manikins. And posed gladly, it is said, as long as this fame was of the medium or middle variety. But once a public figure arrives in a big way there are fees to be had for posing. Other personalities, such as the Colonel and the Prince of Wales, are world property.

This highly developed trade, affected by changing influences of styles and personalities, has contributed something else as well. In a world accustomed to the smirking young men of clothing store windows, here at last is a humorous touch. The Paris manikin trade reasoned that a fat man may be interesting, even appealing, as well as a slender one. Perhaps the trade decided that it was time to give the fat man a chance. In other years any clothing store that ventured to admit a patron might be fat would have furnished trade to competitors.

BUT Paris has shown the way to make fat men appealing. While frankly bald and fat, they are represented as good fellows who need not be pushed aside. One well-known fat man of the Boulevards windows stands with feet apart, hands in pockets, a monocle in his eye, a smile upon his face—a pleasant interpretation, giving the figure an air of prosperity and well-being that many a slender manikin might envy. If it cannot be said that this type of figure is an encouragement to laugh and grow fat, it certainly should be compensation to those who have laughed—and turned stout.

Not content with aiding the fat men, the manikin makers have produced a type with impossible nose, staring eyes and a round moon face. But reproduced with such a good nature as to please the model himself. The trade is trying zealously to impart joviality to the clothing store windows. The bald-headed, homely man may see himself reproduced with a grin that suggests he has just made money. And that feeling might well compensate any man—manikin or otherwise—for being a trifle homely.

As if these numerous achievements of the manikin art were not sufficient, the makers have struck off into a new field of caricature. Recently the "figures geometriques" appeared, with heads modeled geometrically. This touch lifts the figures a little higher toward acknowledged art.

The Parisian manikin makers surely deserve a word of thanks. For years the handsome young men of the show windows have looked patronizingly upon ordinary males, standing outside the glass. With their tilted chins and poised limbs they have made the living gender feel more imperfect than nature could require. But nowadays any man pausing before a clothing window may smile, for the dummies have been humanized.

YANKEE TIN PEDDLERS OF A BYGONE DAY.

ELDERLY New Englanders living in the rural sections like to recall the old tin-peddlers' carts which appeared at their doors every so often with pans and kitchenware. Those earlier day itinerants were invariably shrewd yet kindly Yankees who gave good values and made friends wherever they went.

Although generally called tin peddlers, they carried a large assortment of miscellaneous household utilities. From door to door they moved, collecting old magazines, rags, lead pipe and other marketable metals, giving from their stock in exchange. The carts opened from the sides to display the articles carried.

$82,000,000 of its authorized capital of $100,000,000, and each, in the above manner, has paid in one-quarter of its subscription. A like method is used in handling the proceeds of the Young plan loan, the first $300,000,000 slice of which was recently floated.

The result is that no one in the B. I. S. needs to soil his fingers counting currency; everything is a matter of bookkeeping, debiting and crediting, crediting and debiting. It is true that aside from its function of collecting and distributing reparations it has the important function, which the bank has taken pains to stress from the start, of promoting the cooperation of central banks and providing additional facilities for international financial operations; but none of this requires currency actually to pass through its doors. All the bank needs for its various functions is a house full of offices with a big room for its board meetings, and that is what it has.

ANY modern office building throughout the world would have served the bank's purpose fully as well, or perhaps even better, than the hotel chosen for its activities. A New York skyscraper, picked at random, would have been a sight more in keeping with the great business affairs of the institution. But the reparations creditors, meeting at The Hague last Winter, were opposed to any non-European location. Great Britain suggested that the bank establish itself in London, long the centre of world finance. The Belgians insisted that Brussels was still more advantageous. Finally Switzerland, neutral in the war, was decided upon, and Basle was named as the site rather than Geneva to prevent the possibility that the League's political interests might influence the bank.

The hall in which the board holds its monthly meeting was formerly a hotel dining room. In the centre is a huge oval table with a tan instead of a green baize top. It will seat forty or fifty comfortably, and when the members of the board now meet they cannot fill the circle even with the help of their experts and the higher officials of the bank. The board consists of sixteen directors, but it can increase this number at its discretion to a maximum of twenty-five.

The chairs, the desks in the corners, with their telephones waiting, the books and documents on the wall, the color scheme of tan and brown—everything in the spacious pleasant room gives the impression of conservative modernity, dignity, solidity, quiet efficiency. If one may wonder in the lobby where he is, he cannot wonder in this room, so manifestly is it the directors' room of a big bank.

The hall faces across a glass-enclosed sunporch on a small garden. There is another but smaller oval table on the porch and here the directors or a subcommittee can meet on pleasant days, still hidden from the street by the foliage.

The Home of the Bank for International Settlements.

If the board room looks the part, not all of the directors do. One sees a man whose distinguished profile, gray goatee and rakishly tilted black slouch hat seem to point infallibly to an artist or a bohemian, and learns that he is Montagu Collet Norman, governor of the Bank of England. One sees a stocky German who has a politician's free and easy manner to the press; he is Dr. Hans Luther, governor of the Reichsbank. Governor Emile Moreau of the Bank of France, with his conservative, skeptically prudent air and the curiously rigid deprecating gesture of his right arm, answers better, perhaps, to the popular conception of a big banker, and so does the solid-appearing Gates W. McGarrah, the American president of the bank.

But it is a shock, at least to the European, to find that that slim alert young Frenchman, obviously not 35, is Pierre Quesnay, the general manager of this international bankers' bank. And though one sees at a glance that Leon Fraser is a live business man (so alive that one expects him at any moment to take off his coat and roll up his shirt-sleeves), the geniality of the American vice president of the superbank will come as a pleasant surprise to any who thinks that a banker must necessarily be haughty and hard-bitten.

Since one of the main functions of the bank is to promote cooperation among the big national central banks, their governors are encouraged to become personally acquainted. The board with its regular monthly meetings in Basle gives them an even better opportunity to do this than the less frequent League Council sessions give to Foreign Ministers. There have been only two regular meetings so far, but both have been attended by the governors of such institutions as the Banks of England, France and Germany.

The board meetings serve not only to bring the bank governors together, but to place them and the institutions they direct in closer and more frequent touch with the rest of the world. These financiers have the same tradition of secrecy as the diplomats, but the board meetings have caught them in the same web of circumstance as the Council sessions of the League have caught the Foreign Ministers. The Council began by holding nearly all its sessions in secret; now what few brief private meetings it holds during a week's session are devoted chiefly to minor administrative details and the results are disclosed at once. The bank began by excluding the press and public not only from the board room, but from the whole building while the board was in session. The directors, however, were soon brought to realize that it was a public, international institution they were directing and that the more secret a meeting in which conflicting national interests are represented the surer some will seek to gain advantage by letting their own version leak out to the press.

On the next occasion the press was admitted to the lobby, but not to the meeting of the board. The hangover of secrecy was, indeed, so strong that the attendants would not permit a look into that sacred room even after all the directors had left. Small wonder that wags, pointing to the front windows of the building, all of which, save the two flanking the entrance door, looked as if they had not been cleaned in a month, asked if they were left dirty purposely to keep out prying eyes or merely to tell the world that its money was in economical hands.

But the newspaper men were in the lobby and the directors had to pass through their sieve in leaving. This means that the custom being followed at Basle is the same as at Geneva, where Foreign Ministers have to mingle freely with the press and public in the corridors to leave the building. Far different was the practice at the London naval conference, where the delegates used one entrance to St. James's Palace and the press another so that never the twain might meet.

WHEN the second bank meeting ended, Vice President Fraser, General Manager Quesnay and a German member of the staff together met the assembled press of three languages to tell in a newsy statement what the board had done and to answer questions. Though the bank has not yet gone so far as the League in publicity, it has certainly developed further along this line than the Council did in its first two sessions.

Indeed, British correspondents express astonishment at the way they find the Old Lady of Threadneedle Street "thawing and beginning to become almost human after sitting for a day or so under the sunporch of the International Bank." And they chortle over the story that Montagu Norman, on the night after the June meeting, went to the Basle Summer casino and heard there his first jazz—and rather liked it. The story may exaggerate, but, like a caricature, it tells a lot.

The air of Basle, at any rate, bids fair to have the same affect on international banking that the famous "Geneva atmosphere" has on diplomacy.

WHEN THE BATTLESHIP IS A MOVIE THEATRE

The Big Guns, Turrets and Winches Form the Seats, the Sea and Starry Sky the Background, and "S. R. O." Is the Rule

By WALTER H. MacWILLIAMS

THE boatswain's shrill pipe shrieks. All hands aboard the battleship are alert for the "word" which is to be passed from the bridge by the boatswain's mate on watch:

"Now there will be movies tonight on the port side of the quarterdeck at 19:30. The second section will rig the movie screen at 19:100."

A slight pause, and the "word" is repeated, so that all hands will be certain to get it. This "word" is transmitted over loud-speakers located at important parts of most battleships. And, as the twenty-four-hour numeral time system is used in the naval service, 19:30 indicates that there will be movies at 7:30 in the evening.

A cheer greets the announcement. The fleet is engaging in annual concentration manoeuvres. Actual war conditions are being simulated. For several nights past the fleet has been pursuing, engaging and defeating the "enemy." All ships were darkened, and there were no movies. And movies are one of the sailor's favorite diversions.

It is not necessary to pass a "word" about movies subsequently, because by the time the second section begins to rig the screen at 19:100—7 o'clock—the bronzed gobs will start to "cop" the best seats and sites. And what an assortment of seats there are! The bluejackets (whitejackets now, for "whites are uniform") occupy every location from which the pictures can be seen advantageously—tops of big gun turrets, winches, electric cranes, booms, the upper decks, the ship's boats resting in the cradles on the boat deck, ventilators, the cage masts, and by lying, sitting or standing about the decks. No chairs are provided for the men in this movie theatre.

At dinner the attendants serving officers' messes inquire which of the officers are going to the movies and see that the proper number of chairs are provided. These chairs are, of course, placed at the front.

It is only 7 o'clock, but most available locations are occupied. The gobs, having secured good places, can swap yarns about what happened on such-and-such ship, what irresistible sheiks they are ashore, what they did in the last port, and what they are going to do in the next port.

ONE of the chief characteristics of the movie theatres on shore is their splendor; so gorgeous and luxurious are they that the word "palace" is used to describe them. But the shipboard movie theatre, rigged on the port side of the quarterdeck, is quite different.

The theatre is in the open air, which renders the use of sound pictures on board battleships a genuine problem. (The development of satisfactory sound picture equipment is being intensively studied.) Ventilation is always good, and sometimes there is so much fresh air that the screen cannot be put up at all.

The screen is rigged to a stanchion outboard and to a gun turret inboard. The outboard setting is the sea and sky, with the lifelines, huge bits, chocks, stanchions and a lifeboat swinging on its davits, for the immediate foreground decorations. The inboard wall is composed of turrets with their long, tapering guns fingering the night and the bizarre birdlike outline of a seaplane atop the turret catapult, the cage mast, uptakes, winches and other ship's gear—a rather uneven but solid wall.

The rear is the pyramiding mass of naval architecture culminating in the bridge and steel network of the foremast, on which, like white birds, the gobs are perched. The "interior" of the theatre becomes an inchoate mass of cubistic lines and shadows because of the ship's lights and the glare cast by the movie projector. Overhead is the deep-indigo starry heaven.

"Clong-clong, clong-clong, clong-clong, clong," sounds the ship's bell on the bridge. It is 7:30. Off go the lights. On goes the picture. For an hour and a half there will be no clanging of the "general quarters" gongs to send all hands to battle stations.

The restraint and decorum of the movie theatre on shore are absent, and the sailors' remarks, exclamations and outbursts of sighs, groans and spontaneous laughter are almost as interesting as the picture, particularly during passionate love scenes or slap-stick comedy.

A comedy opens the program, and a feature picture follows. Since the introduction and extension of sound pictures it has become increasingly difficult to secure new programs of silent pictures; but a workable system of alternating new programs with "Asiatics" has been worked out. "Asiatics" are films that have toured the ships and stations in China and the Philippines. Some of them are so old that they seem new. But whether the picture is a recent release or an old "Asiatic" seems to make very little difference to the audience.

If the eye wanders from the screen out over the southern sea, one sees a cycloramic setting in which dull massive silhouettes of battleships move, twinkling lights of the far-spread ships give an appearance of a prairie town, or a flat countryside at night; blinker signal lights at the trucks of the ships flash fitfully as the messages fly between the Commander-in-Chief and the division and ship commanders. Night-piercing rays from powerful searchlights cut the sky into a jumble of strange angles at times; the red and green running lights glow steadily in the darkness, indicating the courses of the ships. Gleaming lines and splashes of phosphorescent light shoot over the water and in the wakes cast by the steaming ships.

Overhead is a star-bespangled sky, out of which a falling star may comet to the sea below. A tropical trade wind, with a suggestion of sea tang in it, caresses the movie audience and produces just enough sea swell to impart a gentle motion to the vessel. The grandeur and beauty of the scene dwarfs the elaborate artificial effects attained by designers and decorators of movie "palaces" on shore.

The film runs out, leaving a blank light on the screen. A shout goes up. The show is over. A grand rush is made by the gobs to reach their hammocks and turn in. And lucky is the man who will have all night in his "dream sack."

ECONOMIC WORLD AT CROSSROADS

I venture to say further that unless there is a drastic alteration of international economics to meet the menace of overproduction, the whole world will be beaten back to a lower scale of living. More people will have to get back to the land, even in England. Industry will have to adopt a self-imposed restriction of output, thereby creating increased unemployment of city workers, unless they accept lower wages for a half-time job. Self-contained nations barring out their neighbors' goods must look forward to the simple life, which may, after all, be better for their health and morals. But they cannot have it both ways.

Temporarily, at least, until there is a radical readjustment to new conditions, I foresee the end of a period when a few nations like Great Britain, Germany and the United States became vastly rich by selling manufactured goods to the rest of the world and to each other in return for raw material and other commodities. The easy and rapid exchange of commerce is being definitely checked, and the immediate result will be this coming economic crisis.

THERE were many economists, especially in the United States, who believed with rosy optimism in the almost unlimited expansion of market which would keep pace with the mechanical progress in production. They believed that backward peoples could be taught to adopt Western ideas and methods and become consumers of American products. Dr. E. G. Nourse of the Brookings Institution of Washington, D. C., has put this idea into a neat paragraph.

"It was not so long ago," he says, "that we were looking forward quite confidently to the day when millions of Orientals would each add six inches to the tail of his shirt, smoke American cigarettes, and add white flour and oranges to his diet. This, and similar development in backward areas of South America and Africa, would no doubt have kept the forward march of demand comfortably in step with the world's expanding ability to supply, but today the hope has gone glimmering; at least the prospect of its fulfillment must be long deferred."

It is not happening now. India is buying less cotton goods from Lancashire and Mr. Gandhi's followers boycott British manufactures. China is a poorer customer for everybody than before the war. Russia is not doing big business, in proportion to her enormous population. The Arab world still lives on scanty diet. The East does not absorb many automobiles, radio sets, reapers and binders, bathroom taps and other articles of Western manufacture, counting heads in densely populated countries. If they did require these things, it is quite likely they would make them themselves and try to export them to Britain, Germany and the United States, so that the problem would be the same, relatively.

What is the solution to this mighty problem creeping over the world? It would need a bigger prophet than I pretend to be to give an elementary formula for the renewal of world prosperity. Personally I believe that the lowering of the tariff walls would quicken the exchange of goods and increase consuming power by reducing prices and the cost of living. They are artificial restrictions and false props. Then there ought to be, and I think there must be, a shifting of populations. Australia and Canada ought to take several millions from British stock, relieving the congestion of industrial cities and developing new communities. Instead of this fierce cutthroat competition in export trade, there ought to be a scientific arrangement between groups of nations. Europe should come to an international agreement about wages and hours, so that one nation on a fair standard of living should not be dragged down by the sweated labor of another. The machine should be controlled and not allowed to supplant the human being.

That is to say, there should be an organized relation between output, employment and consuming capacity. Higher wages and shorter hours would increase the spending power of the workers in countries where wages are low and hours long. But it is probable that these are only feeble expedients to relieve the present economic troubles of the world and to ease the gravity of the coming crisis.

HEAVY PENALTIES

await jewel smugglers

SMUGGLING jewelry is dangerous. Rewards for information are large. Penalties are heavy.

Under the Tariff Act of 1922 25 per cent. of the net amount recovered by the Government, but not over $50,000 in any case, may be awarded and paid by the Secretary of the Treasury to any person who furnishes original information which leads to the "recovery of any duties withheld, or any fine, penalty or forfeiture incurred."

The Government can seize jewelry years after it has been smuggled, so that a temporary success at the time of arrival is no security.

Information relating to the smuggling of jewelry may be sent by letter, cable or wireless to this office. The name of the informer will not be divulged even to Government officials. The information will be filed in the name of this Association, and the full reward received from the Government paid to the informer.

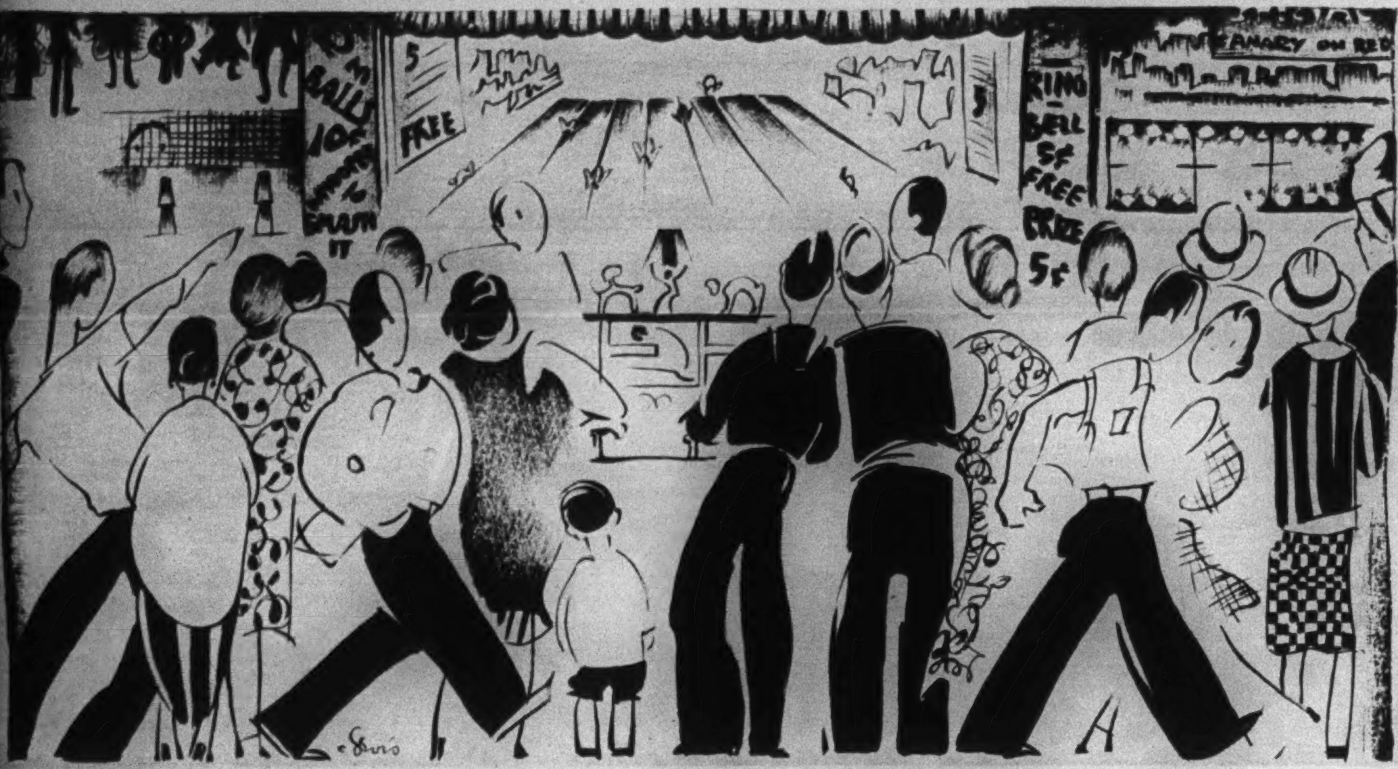
SEEKING LIFE'S GOLDEN RING AT CONEY



"They Feed on the Human Yearning for Something That Is Free."

By LEWIS NICHOLS

TO the south of Manhattan, far at the end of Brooklyn, lies what has come to be known as Bagdad on the Island. Dervishes whirl there most professionally, and dancing girls trip their shadowy ways over countless painted floors. But there the comparison must end; the rest of it is typically American. Probably Bagdad is, too, by now, what with the talking movies and the literature of the West.

A shrill, faintly whistling calliope starts the first few bars of a New England drinking song. With an utter, animal disregard of the implied paradox, horses slowly begin to move. They walk, trot and finally burst into a gallop. They jump hedges, fences, hurdles—and with just a little imagination of the better kind they can be seen chasing down a sunny polo field at Meadow Brook. Indeed, they go Mr. Hitchcock's ponies one better, for they work, with music.

Their riders sway—or bounce—with the best. Nothing unseats them. Miles roll away into the far distance. The horses scurry on into the sunset, lashed by spurs and a whip. But then they begin to tire. They gallop no longer, they ease down to a trot, to a walk. The calliope, exhausted, wheezes to an unexpected halt—just where it is time to lift your steins on high. The horses shiver slightly at the end of the trail and then are still. The adventure is over.

But one will ride again. Once more he will guard the stage coach into Purple Gulch, or will be the bandit seeking its hoarded gold. For he has not been idle; he has leaned out dangerously and has grabbed the golden ring. Very literary people are prone to say that the merry-go-round is symbolic of all that is life. And if that be so, the treasure in the little piece of gilded bronze is symbolic of Coney Island. It is good for a free ride.

Not so long ago, smooth, clean-shaven men with derbies haunted the circuses and the carnivals. Standing on stools behind large, wooden boxes, they explained to farmers how much the latter had yet to learn about peas. It was a profitable trade, until the sheriff or the lynching party appeared. But they have pretty well gone by now, they have departed to join the gamblers of the Mississippi boats in some nocturnal valhalla where suckers are born more than one a minute.

It would not be fair to refer to the island's beckoning enterprises as relics of the old shell game. That pleasurable occupation was operated on the principle that the player could not win. Down Coney Island way he can—sometimes. The law of averages has stepped in where previous angels feared to go; and the proprietors will willingly give a doll to the man able to knock over the bottles. He is sufficiently rare to allow a good profit.

But if the two games are not the same in operation, they are so in principle. They feed on the human yearning for something that is free. What if the large, gayly colored box contains only a half dozen pieces of candy? It has been won fairly. The house has been outwitted thoroughly, and in the circle of the admiring there probably is not any one else who could do it. Thus the victory, one that is at the same time the enticement. Try again.

The games (who said of chance?) are just a part of the island's lure. There are lights and music and strange sights and sounds. Shops, factories, darkish rooms east of Third Avenue are lost in the splendor of a new world. One can dress in knickers and a green polo shirt on Forsyth Street and in less than an hour be a member of the leisured class strolling with fellow-members. A breeze comes from the ocean, and the lights of a liner slide along the horizon. That way lies the Riviera.

A week's disappointment, seven days of heat and dirt, can be forgotten when the golden ring has been expertly caught. Drudgery, dullness, the habit of a month's hard labor, pass swiftly as the clanking chain carries the roller coaster to the top of its first high hill. Shoulders stooped from a year of sitting anxiously above a ledger straighten as the third rag-baby finally decides to topple over backward into the net behind.

A shooting gallery, white painted and mechanical, becomes suddenly the wilds of Canada, where men are men and the ducks fall down when hit just as real ducks do. Horses are there for those who would ride to the hunt. Old Mills beckon casually and inside provide unexpected items over which it is hard to be blasé. Down along the Midway are the side-shows, tents filled with material for the philosophers. But their purposes now are utilitarian.

Into the history of Coney Island can be read a change. Of old, life there was built on chance. The public could spin a wheel which clicked along only until the proprietor decided it should stop and so put his foot on the brake under the counter. The public could also go into great museums and for tidy little sums witness the famous murders and see the famous freaks. The section still boasts the museums, but they seem a little smaller, not quite so thronged. Chairs are empty now and dust gathers on signs advertising "The Jointless Mystery" and "The Girl With Seal-like Fins." Where have they gone?

The island now specializes more in the dual arts of thrill and skill than in sensationalism. Roller coasters are higher and faster; merry-go-rounds whirl for longer periods. And everywhere are the games where victory goes to the strong arm and the steady eye. Bottles are piled on top of bottles, and benign-appearing Oriental clerks explain the workings of a poker game played with rubber balls. You can take home a cocoanut for a penny—by tossing the coin so that it rings a bell.

CONEY ISLAND starts the long grind in the morning, with the opening of the beaches. But it it not until late afternoon or early evening that it begins to assume its own. The games go on all day, but quietly. They need the lights, the crowds, to become their best. Sunset, being the end of work, is the beginning of pleasure. Merchants take down their shutters, assemble their goods and so greet it.

By the middle of evening everything is going. High up in the air, the Ferris wheel turns slowly, the cars swaying slightly with the wind. Near it are the roller coasters, advertised for speed and starting out to show good faith. One train no sooner gets back to rid itself of the slightly harassed group of citizens than it is off once more. A scream points the location of the first hill, and all after that is lost in the rumble of the wheels.

Barkers are busy all along the line, clarion barkers—but to an expert not the ones of old. They have gone with the proprietors of the shell games. Big, loudly dressed men, they called a dime a tenth part of a dollar and meant it. Their professional children are more apologetic, they speak of "ten cents." The art of barking is not what it used to be; possibly because humanity has found the mouse-trap in the wood and in these mad, glad days crowd along the path to it.

Be that as it may, these salesmen dance fitfully through the streets, waving three balls and crying the amiable chorus of "only 10 cents." A candidate with a doll, candy, cigar or anything else comes in for special attention—his winnings proving that he has at least been willing to try something once. As they pass by, the barkers shake their arms hopelessly and moan in discouragement.

JUST as their wiles are few, their games are many. The baseball art of hitting the bottles fills the largest percentage of them. But for card players are the poker games, for hunters and racers are the rabbit chases up a hill. Dolls are given for knocking down other dolls, and cigarettes are duly presented to experts who can hit them with corks fired from air rifles. There is also a variation of bowling; a sinister variation that runs into money practically without warning.

Inside the various parks are slides, more wheels, more games and music. Creaking floors squirm under foot, and there are mirrors that startle. Wind rushes up, down or through, and to get out it is necessary gingerly to outwit a rolling barrel. Ghosts appear, genii disappear and there are wraiths lying in wait around all the corners. Guns boom and there is a suspicious swish of water that turns out to be nothing more than a joke by the management.

The decline of side-shows is rather pathetic. Born and brought up in the sear and yellow of another century, they catered to the human desire for novelty in all things. They showed scandal quite a bit, and crime. Around their sides were seated the freaks of the ages. Fat women were next to thin men, and so on through the endless variations. Billed by blaring posters, announced by barkers, they sat complacently. They did not realize that the end was so near.

Coney Island still has a few, however. On the walks before their respective shows are the ticket stands. They are still painted red, but the spirit has gone. On request, the salesman will listlessly

MOUNTAIN FOLK NEAR OUR CITY

the Hudson Highlands, there are the friendly folk who seem glad to see a visitor and who invite her in. One of these families, typical of the district, recently sat and talked of the changes that had come to Sandyfields and the changes yet to come. Great-grandfather and great-grandmother, and granddaughter with a baby in her arms, sat in a well-scrubbed kitchen that smelled of fresh apple pie and baked beans. There was pride in the old man's face as he spoke of the hand-pegged house he lived in, of the hand-pegged house his father had lived in before him. He did not want to leave his home, but "they" were pushing him out. To the mountaineer the park authorities are always "they" and "them."

"I gave them fifty-one acres of woodland, good woodland, too," he said. "Now they want this last ten acres I live on. But I ain't going to give it to them. I was born here, and here I'm going to stay." His aged wife, less belligerent, took the visitor by the hand and led her away into the "best" room.

The best room was cleaner, if possible, than the kitchen. Immaculate curtains hung at the windows, a white lace spread covered the table, enlargements of family photographs adorned the walls. She pointed to two of them. One was of a dapper young blade in black broadcloth, the other of a young and very pretty girl in the stiff country hat of sixty years ago. The wife smiled at the old man in the tired-looking blue shirt and faded trousers who had followed her into the parlor. He in turn smiled rather sheepishly at the visitor. The clock had turned back more than half a century; a bride and bridegroom stood once more before that other bride and bridegroom who had set up housekeeping in a little home in the highlands.

THEY stood, a pleasant family group, waving good-bye, outside the hand-pegged cottage that is soon to come down; grandfather in a broad-brimmed straw hat, grandmother in checkered kitchen apron, the baby in its young mother's arms, and beyond, a red-haired boy holding by the hand a tow-headed little sister. Only the red-haired boy did not smile. His eyes questioned the interloper, for he was of the younger generation of mountaineers already destined for that other world beyond the rim of hills.

Hymns are the music of the mountains, for the mountaineer is a religious person. Many mountaineers still believe that dancing and card-playing lead to perdition. One old lady, Grandmother Jones, worries considerably because the new Episcopal church, recently come to the district, tolerates "jazz music" and dancing in its parish. This stalwart and fierce-eyed old dame has never missed a Sunday service at the Methodist meeting house down the lane, except when she was sick. She will be 90 on her next birthday. She has never been ten miles from the farm where she was born, and where her father was born before her. Once she went to the movies at Suffern. She did not like them, she said.

Grandmother Jones recalls the yard of the Methodist meeting house when it was so full of wagons, buggies and two-wheeled gigs there was no place to hitch another horse. She remembers one family that came every Sunday and sat twelve strong in one pew. Those were the good old days! She recollects many things that will soon be forgotten, for the older mountaineers will soon have passed away. The oldest man in the mountains died not long ago, aged 98.

"Good friends and good haters," said a citizen of Stony Point village, who was born and reared near the mountains. "If a mountaineer likes you, he is your friend for life. But he can hate."

It is nearly 200 years ago since a bride and bridegroom unhitched their ox team in the wilderness that was then the Hudson Highlands. They cut down trees and built a cabin. They reared a family that in time married with the children of other settlers who had taken up subdivisions in the district then being settled by squatters. It was before the days of land records. The new territory was parceled out to patentees and grantees, and a farmer scarcely knew the boundaries of his own claim. He was too busy trying to feed a growing family. More settlers, mostly of Anglo-Saxon stock, followed the Ramapo River up to what is now the town of Sloatsburg, near Suffern, then turned up the valley of Stony Brook. There, near the north end of the west arm of Lake Sebago, they settled. And there can be seen a remnant of the original settlement founded, it is said, by the bridegroom of 1750.

The old names persist in the Highlands — Johnson and Jones, Baisley, O'Dell, Rose and Champeau—but the familiar names of mountain lakes, ponds and streams are being changed to Indian names that the mountaineers do not like and cannot pronounce.

AS in earlier days dogwood stars the mountaineer's country in Springtime and the laurel blooms luxuriantly. To city visitors this year's crop was a show—although according to Grandmother Jones there have been better ones. She recalls Bear Mountain as a pink mass from crown to trailing hem of robe. Each year, before the days of Sunday autoists, hikers and picnickers, the mountains put on a grand Spring flower show, unassisted by human hands: Violets and marsh marigolds along the banks of creeks, wild azaleas, cherry and wisteria on the hills, pink crab apple flowers, fluffy and redolent, in pasturelands.

Then beavers built their dams across running brooks to the distress of farmers who suddenly found pastures and wood roads flooded. Wolves were a menace to flocks and herds and young foxes made off with more chickens than a farmer could raise. Today the gray fox still lurks in remoter mountain passes and an occasional wolf skulks in the shadows of deep, moist hedges. But the wild, free days that hardened the muscles and wrinkled the faces of those first settlers who trekked from open country near New York to the Hudson Highlands, are gone.

SYMBOLS OF POWER BRITAIN REVERES

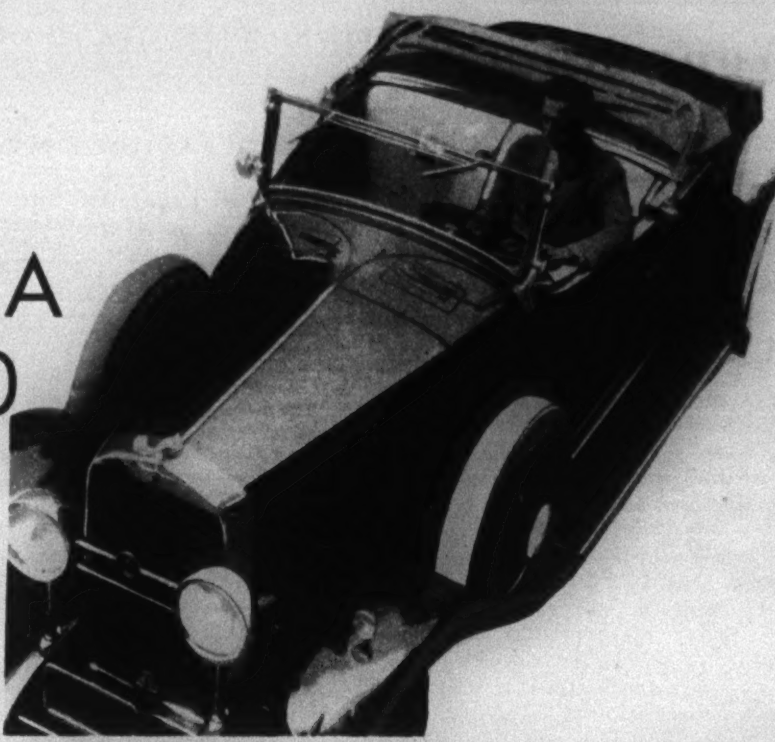
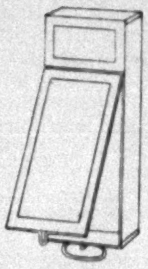
river, the crisis would have been a complete deadlock. Indeed, it might have been necessary to borrow from King George one of the other maces which, by a fortuitous providence, happen to be lying unnoticed among the regalia in the Tower of London. Such an artifice would be revolutionary. Probably it would lose by-elections. But the revolution would be bloodless, and, with Philip Snowden at the Exchequer, nobody would get off taxes.

After all, it is not the precise mace that matters. It is the mace as an idea. We can now see why all the Parliaments of the British Commonwealth are as interested in the mace as the mother of Parliaments, and why Mayors and universities also cultivate an emblem, so ancient, so supreme. The mace restores the past, unifies the present, guarantees the future. It is to institutional Britain what the flag is to the United States of America. It is the Crown in action. It is the King, present if only in symbol. It expresses no opinion. It belongs to no party. It removes no grievance. But it does serve as a reminder. With the mace in position, no man can forget wholly that the nation is greater than the individual. It is a lesson which, doubtless, the mace has already begun to hammer into the head of an honorable member, at the moment held in suspense.





HE DRIVES A $3,000 CAR

BUT HIS SAFE DEPOSIT BOX IS EMPTY

Everyone likes him. He's good fun on a party—he talks interestingly, dresses well and drives an expensive car. But his friends would laugh if they saw the emptiness of his safe deposit box. For he spends all he makes with no thought for the future. He doesn't know the peace of mind and the confidence he'd have if his box at the bank were filled . . . with good securities, working, with him, to increase his income and give him independence . . . and incidentally, all the things extra money can buy him. Are you, too, mis-managing your life? You are unless you realize that good investments are important in your life.

It's not hard to find good securities. We suggest the French Plan because we believe that it's one of the best. It offers the man of moderate means an opportunity to share in the profits derived from income-producing buildings. This is the Plan: The money invested by the public is used to finance the purchase of the land and the construction of the building. Six percent per annum is payable on the money while it remains invested. All additional profits earned and distributed are used to return in cash the money invested. Thereafter, all profits earned and distributed are equally divided between the investors and the Company. You should at least know something about the French Plan. Send for the booklet. AN ARTIST WITH PALETTE AND RACQUET

Between Painting and Tennis, Helen Wills Moody Sees a Kinship That Involves Swiftness and Sureness

By S. J. WOOLF

WHEN Helen Wills Moody arrived from Europe the other day, it was not a newly won tennis cup that she carried. Tall and lithe, as she came on deck preparatory to disembarking, she had in her hand a worn wooden box. All over it were smudges of paint, and as she stood there with the breeze blowing through the willful wisps of golden-brown hair, she looked more like a returning art student than the champion woman tennis player of the world. She was prouder of some of her sketches than of her victories on the courts, and she prized a painting that Augustus John had made of her more than she did the cups she had won.

Indeed I am quite certain that she is more interested in art than she is in tennis, but she sees certain similarities in the two. It is the motion, the swiftness, the glory of sunshine, the smell of the out of doors that appeal to her in the game in which she has won international fame, and it is the appeal that these same things have for her that makes her want to paint. In appearance she is typical of the outdoor woman. About her is that air of youth that Lindbergh also has.

She posed for me at the Junior League. As I entered its large living room with its Colonial furniture and its Venetian blinds drawn to keep out the sunshine, she was sitting on a great sofa beside a window. The light behind her cast her face in shadow and she looked for all the world like one of those paintings that Benson used to do of American girls in their homes.

Above average height, and large-boned, she is yet graceful and trim. Her head is comparatively small for her body—it is in the proportion that the Greeks sought in their statues—and her face might have served sculptors of old Athens as a model for Juno, for there is about her brow and nose that peculiarity of modeling with which they endowed female heads. Her eyes, however, have not the oxlike quality that Homer sings in his description of the mother of the gods. They are gray and distinctly alert, though their outer corners sweep up in almost Oriental fashion. This line accentuates the height of her cheekbones. Her lips are full and seem fuller because they are frankly made up. Indeed she told me that she liked drawings of women which showed that there was rouge on their lips.

IT was difficult to find a place in which she might be posed, for the light was bad. It was she who at last discovered a corner of the room where there would be enough light and where we could work undisturbed.

"Now whom are you doing?" she asked me—"Miss Wills or Mrs. Moody? You know I have said that as far as tennis is concerned, I am Mrs. Moody. In my profession I want to be known by my maiden name."

"Which did you take up first?" I asked.

"Lead pencils are much lighter than tennis racquets," she replied "so I began to draw first. Indeed I started in when I was about 3 years old; I think I must have inherited whatever talent I have from my mother, for she has always drawn and painted, as far back as I can remember. I took up tennis some years later, in order to play with my father, so I suppose I have practiced art longer than I have tennis."

Her laugh was infectious. The day was not overwarm, but she had a palm leaf fan which now and again she waved before her. The sunlight, reflected from a red building across the street, threw a warm glow over her face, which is tanned a golden hue.

Mrs. Moody likes modern art. That is not surprising, for she herself is an expression of today. We spoke of art and sport.

"There is a similarity," she said. "Either, to be good, must have rhythm of motion. It is the motion in both that I love. Have you ever seen Tilden play?" Before I could answer she had risen, and, using the fan as a racquet, and turning her arm so slowly that she seemed like a slow-motion picture, she went through the action of returning a swift ball.

"Did you notice that curve and that rhythm? There is as much play of line in one of his returns as there is in an old Japanese print. Modern art appeals to me because it is immeasurably influenced by the play of action. The Japanese were keen enough years and years ago to appreciate the need of it. Swiftness and sureness are essential in all sort of sports. Indeed I have come to the conclusion that anything good in art or sport is of necessity quick in its accomplishment. I don't mean that the learning of it is rapid. The artist or the sportsman who is really good, having approached perfection, knows what he wants to do and goes ahead and does it, swiftly and surely. The man who hesitates before a net or a canvas is not likely to succeed either on the court or in the studio.

"Swiftness and sureness are what I like about Cézanne and Gauguin and Matisse. Each one of them has filled his canvases with the essence of life, of motion. You know, I think there can be as much action in a still life as there is in the picture of a rushing train. Indeed, I have seen paintings of fruit which were more alive and embodied more of that spirit of movement, by a knowledge of design, than some pictures of moving men.

"Take those pictures of French troops painted shortly after the Franco-Prussian War, and tell me, have they as much action as a peach or a pear on a plate by Cézanne or Manet?

"Oh by the way," she went on with a quick enthusiasm. "I met Matisse when he stopped in San Francisco this year. Can any one who has ever met him doubt the sincerity of his work?"

I mildly suggested that perhaps the thickness of his glasses had something to do with what he did.

"That puts me in mind of a story that I heard about Monet," she said. "He went to an oculist who gave him a prescription for new lenses, and when he had them made and put them on he exclaimed, 'Why if I were to wear these I would paint like Bouguereau!' So he wisely left them off. But Matisse's glasses—if they are what makes him paint and draw the way he does, thank goodness he wears them!

"Do you know, I get the same feeling of action and rush and emotion, of the necessity of being ever alert, of watching intently, of straining every muscle, when I stand before some of his canvases, that I get when I am on one side of a tennis net.

"It does not matter what he paints, whether it is the interior of a seraglio, or an odalisque or a tree, they all affect me similarly."

I asked what she wanted to paint.

"You see I am only a beginner. I hardly ever went to art school. What I learned I got at the University of California, and though I have a studio now—or rather I did have one before I went to Europe on this trip, and I am going to take it again when I get back—I do not think I am far enough advanced to say definitely what I shall do.

"At present I think I want to do portraits, but I have the woman's prerogative of changing my mind. While I love the out-of-doors, it is people who primarily interest me. I am interested in them psychologically, which, indeed, may be one of the reasons why I am so much interested in tennis. I believe it is the mental side of that game as much as the athletic that appeals to me.

"In order to do a portrait you have to analyze your subject, and you must do the same with your opponent across the net. The player who has a clear idea of the mental make-up of the person with whom he is playing is not so likely to be fooled by him; he is more apt to be in a position to make a safe return.

"I do not mean to say that all portrait painters would make good tennis players"—the laugh was again audible—"for, indeed, I think that each is born and not made. You can teach any one to hit a ball or put paint on canvas, but these things do not make either a tennis player or an artist. And, likewise, no matter what amount of talent any one has, that by itself is not enough. Practice is also necessary.

"Oh, please do not let me talk like a copy book. What do I know, anyway, about art? All I know is that all my life I have wanted to be an artist, and I am going to be one."

"How much of your time does tennis take up?" I asked.

"Oh, not an awful lot," was the answer. "I don't play much in Winter—I devote practically all my time to painting. Even when I have to go away on trips, I sketch. I take only about an hour and a half each day to play. The club to which I belong is only about five minutes away from my home, and it takes me about ten minutes to change my clothes, so that I can work a large part of the day."

AN attendant came up and told Mrs. Moody she was wanted on the telephone. "Tell him I can't come, will you? Say that I am having a portrait made." Again the laugh. "You know I feel terribly important whenever I pose for a picture. It makes me feel as if I were really some one."

She told me about the other pictures that had been made of her. "But you know," she went on, "I feel that a portrait ought to do something more than just give the plan of your face. It ought to tell a story, the life story of the subject. It ought to move and not be static, for nobody, not even the laziest person in the world, is ever still. You know that is why Augustus John is so great—he has done more than simply put down the outline of my features. He has shewn the 'I' of me."

By this time there were several other people in the room, young women who without being rude were casting sidelong glances at Mrs. Moody. She apparently neither saw nor heard them. She went on talking as if they were not there. Galleries meant nothing to her.

Mrs. Moody walked down stairs with me as I left, and on the way out she said, "I do hope you have enough to write about. You see, I really have not much to talk about. I have not done anything in the world as yet. But wait, wait until I can paint, and then you'll come and do another picture of me—that is, if I am not too old by that time—and I'll give you the formula which I will have discovered on how to succeed."

She walked with me to the vestibule and there, waiting to be put in a taxi, was her luggage, for she was leaving for her home in California. There were a number of bags. No tennis racquets were in evidence, but there were two paint boxes.

A LEPER ISLE TO BE A SPA

CAPE TOWN.

MEMORIES strange and grim are aroused by the news that Robben Island, the South African leper, lunatic and convict settlement, is to be abandoned. Stories as weird as any from Devil's Island or Molokai are told of Robben Island in the old days—stories of mutinies and dramatic escapes, human nobility, shipwrecks and drownings.

Robben Island, star-shaped and fringed by dangerous reefs, lies across the Table Bay entrance from Cape Town. Many ships, including the fine mail steamer Tantallon Castle, have found their graves in the cold Atlantic surf off the island shore. The writer has flown over the island, sailed there in small craft, walked among the lepers and chatted with them. And on Robben Island there are tales told that seldom drift across to Cape Town, the busy city seven miles across the bay.

There was, for example, the story of the ship, laden with liquor, which ran onto the island and broke up. Then the cargo began to come ashore. The eager lepers struggled out into the surf to drag barrels of rum and cases of champagne onto the beach. The lepers had grievances, fancied and real, and as they drank they remembered. One after another they set fire to the hovels in which they lived, dancing round the flames.

As a contrast there is the story of Father Engleheart who—like Father Damien, the martyr of Molokai in the Pacific—worked among the lepers for many years and made a friend of every one. It takes a man of strong nerve to do that; leprosy is not pretty. Fortunately, Father Engleheart never contracted the disease.

There was a surgeon on the island long ago, however, who caught leprosy while operating on a patient. Leprosy is only slightly contagious; but the risk is always there for those who live among the afflicted. This surgeon did not live long after he discovered the first symptoms. They found a revolver beside him.

IN the old days a boat rowed by convicts would come out to the little steamer that brought the mails—and the tragic human cargo for the island. Rebellious native chiefs were often exiled there. One of them, Makanna the Left Handed, made himself a frail raft and paddled away on a dark night toward the distant mainland shore. He was drowned in the surf. Other prisoners tried to swim away, and some were drowned and some seized by the sharks, the real guardians of the island.

Treasure ships—galleons of the Dutch East India Company and modern steamers carrying gold—have been lost off Robben Island. Many old coins have been found by children playing among the rock pools at low tide. Thirty years ago a ship with a large consignment of colored beads was lost on the north coast of the island. To this day a northwest gale sends the brightly-colored pieces of glass onto the beach.

One more Grand Guignol scene. The native lepers, resenting their state of imprisonment far from friends and relatives, plotted a terrible revenge on the government which kept them on the island. It was announced that a commission of officials and doctors was coming to the settlement. The lepers planned to pass on their disease to the visitors. Mercifully the plot was discovered, and evidence was taken with the lepers carefully guarded.

For many years now the patients have been well-fed and well-housed. But it has been realized that the foggy Winter climate of the island is unhealthful, and the lepers are to be removed to a new hospital settlement near Pretoria. Robben Island, the traditional home of tragedy, will then become a pleasure resort—the Coney Island of South Africa.

TINY MALTA AN ANCIENT CENTRE OF HISTORY

In Mid-Mediterranean, She Is Sensible to Many Currents

ON the island of Malta it recently happened that, for some reason of discipline, an obscure monk was ordered to change his domicile. The incident seemed trivial, and yet this item of news is headlined throughout the world; in the diplomatic field it is discussed by the Pope as spiritual sovereign over 330,000,000 of the faithful and by King George as temporal sovereign over 450,000,000 of British subjects.

Why is it that the Mediterranean harbors and headlands of Malta are illuminated by an especial fame of which we know not the beginning and cannot foretell the end? What is the secret of the spell exerted by so arid a fragment of rock, ruddy in the blazing sun? It cannot be mere magnitude. The island is only seventeen miles long and nine miles broad. Nor is it wealth. True, the women weave a famous lace and fruits ripen in the shelter of walls. But if anything, Malta's natural resources are subnormal.

For thousands of years the significance of Malta has been, indeed, its insignificance. It is merely a point on the map, but the position of that point tells the whole story. North, south, east and west, Malta is the centre of a compass, the pivot on which swings the trembling needle of destiny.

Whatever wind has blown, whatever war has been waged, whatever piracies are perpetrated, whatever commerce is developed, the movement sweeps, sooner or later, over this universal rendezvous. The landscape was molded by myriad coral insects and adjusted by the underground swell of volcanic energy. But long before a few finishing touches had disintegrated Malta into a group of three, including Gozo and Comino, man had challenged nature.

Early Maltese were cousins of the Iberians in Spain, of the French Basques, of the prehistoric Cornishmen. But, successivly, there came the Phoenicians, the Romans, the Northmen, the Arabs, the Crusaders, the French, the British, During the war the census was swollen by Gurkhas and Germans, Senegalese, New Zealanders and Annamites. With friend and foe, sick, wounded and prisoners, the camps, jails and hospitals of Malta were thronged. Even today these scraps of territory, only 118 square miles in area, are crowded, inch by inch, with antiquities, churches, palaces, fortresses, not forgetting 225,000 inhabitants—more than a thousand to the square mile. The climate of Malta is immune from cold, but there is sometimes a typhoon, or "gregalia." There are breakwaters now, but in 1555 there was a tornado so fierce that 600 persons were drowned in the harbor.

Homer goes further back to weave a storm into a legend. It seems that the deity Neptune and a nymph called Phoesa had a son, Polypheme, who was a giant with a single eye in the middle of his forehead. When Polypheme had killed six of his sailors Ulysses took a torch and put out the eye. The vengeful Neptune pursued Ulysses with bumpy atmospheric conditions and, off Gozo, the Greeks came to grief. Ulysses, the only survivor, at once hurried to a grotto which is still shown to visitors.

The hero was obsessed by the idea of returning hastily to his wife, Penelope; and when, in the grotto, he was greeted by Calypso, the daughter of Atlas, he only remained with her seven years. Then Zeus sent Mercury, the Lindbergh of Olympus, to inform Calypso that she must be more mindful of her dignity as a goddess. Ulysses felled, therefore, the various trees within reach, built a boat and sailed away. In Malta there has been a shortage of lumber ever since.

A SECOND shipwreck, this time historic, made an even greater difference to the island. On the dark horizon, one day, there appeared a vessel in distress. It hailed from Alexandria and, with 266 persons, was bound for Rome. Throughout a fortnight it had battled with the typhoon. The cargo had been thrown overboard. Mutinous sailors had tried to escape in a boat, but finally they ran the vessel into a bay and the whole company reached the land.

Such were the traditions of Malta when St. Paul, a survivor of that shipwreck, immediately aroused attention. A serpent seized his hand but he shook it into the fire, himself taking no hurt, and today there is not a snake to be seen.

So with disease. The chief man among the Maltese was Publius. His old father was suffering from dysentery and St. Paul healed him. According to tradition, Publius was converted, became Malta's first Bishop, and is today venerated as a saint.

The die of the Christian faith was cast, but it was only after 1,500 years of turmoil that the drama developed its climax. Crusades swept over Malta, and the pilgrims following them to Jerusalem were often sick or injured. To give first aid, an order of hospitalers was founded, their oath being chastity, poverty and obedience. The earliest of all Red Crosses is thus the eight-pointed Cross of the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem. But in the struggle with the Saracens the Knights were driven from Jerusalem to Cyprus, from Cyprus to Rhodes, and, ejected from Rhodes, they received from the Emperor Charles V a grant of the island of Malta. Their cross became the Maltese Cross.

Once more, the onslaught of the Turk was terrific. Besieging Malta, his forces were reduced from 40,000 to 15,000 men. Of the defenders, numbering 9,000, only 600 escaped without a wound. Ferocity was reciprocal. The Turks displayed slain Christians with crosses gashed on their breasts. Christians replied by firing the heads of Turkish prisoners from their guns.

The defense triumphed, and into the coffers of the Knights, grateful Europe showered largess. Each nation supplied its own warriors with an "auberge," or headquarters, and these edifices are still among the glories of architecture. The Cathedral of St. John was adorned by untold wealth. In splendor, of jewelry and tapestry, if not in intrinsic art, it rivals St. Mark's, Venice.

During the conflict between Cross and Crescent the Maltese Knights became, perhaps, a little forgetful of their vows. If the Barbary States engaged in piracy, so did they. Both sides ravaged the Mediterranean and collected lucrative cargoes of slaves. Some other authority than they was desired by the Maltese themselves. When Napoleon offered his services the islanders paid him the compliment of concealing the silver gates of St. John's with a coat of paint. However, he took the gates away and ransom had to be paid for them. Then, flushed with his victory at the Nile, Admiral Nelson raised $33,000 for an expedition to Malta, a sum sufficient at the moment. But this was only one of his indiscretions. At the Peace of Amiens Britain promised to give up Malta.

If, then, the Union Jack still flies over what Byron called "a place of cursed steps," and the bluejackets describe as "yells, bells and smells," the arrangement is merely temporary. At any time, Great Britain is as ready to evacuate Malta as the United States is ready to internationalize the Panama Canal. She must only be careful about anybody else going there.

Incidentally, the fortress of Malta is stated to be impregnable. Any nation that relieves Great Britain of Malta will secure a valuable coaling station, dock yard and naval base. Meanwhile, Malta shines with Gibraltar, Suez and Singapore like a jewel in a strategic necklace, of which the string has yet to be snapped. P. W. W.

HUMOR OF OUR BACKWOODS

BACKWOODS America, the relatively isolated hill communities of the South and Southwest, are a fertile field for conversational humor.

Back-country citizens are invariably amused by ignorance of rural ways—the newcomer who "reckons" to get rich off a few slanting acres of stump-land, who would bear down on his plowshares, tie up fodder with a string, or buckle the throat-latch of a bridle before he set the bit. They take keen delight in burlesquing urban wise-cracks and Josh-an'-Rube jests.

An old-timer from Pea Ridge, speaking lately for the enlightment of a party of knicker-clad tourists, said:

"Well, suh, me and Lem heah, we come from the reel backwoods. Yes suh, along our bend of the crick old Pap Eason is about the only feller as knows how to read and write. So about seven of us chipped in and subscribed for the Springfield newspaper, figgerin' to have Pap read hit to us.

"Well we done hit, and one day we was settin' around listenin' to him read about where the paper said as how everybody had ought to keep plowin' their corn because hit appeared like the droughts was comin', and if they did they'd shore be hard on the corn crop. We was all sort of puzzled and directly Mart Miller he says:

" 'Say Pap, what's a drought?' "

"Well Pa he pulled at his chin whiskers a spell and struck up a pipeful of green terbaccer, then he says: 'Well, Mart, if I aint mightily mistook, a drought is one of them new-fangled varmints that's a cross betwixt a coon and a wildcat—anyway, they're shore hell on corn.' "

One time little Sammy Woolwine went to town with his father and saw, for the first time, a railroad train.

"Pa, what's that?"

"Son, that's a train."

"Well, Pa, if hit was to run through town sideways hit shore would raise hell."

THEY tell, too, a sad story of a mountain lad who was run off from home because he went out hunting with three rocks in his pocket and brought back only two squirrels.

The backwoods sense of humor has subtleties as well as slap-stick. It enjoys Aunt Lulu Pettigrew's compiaint that most of her relations have died of nobility, and relishes the predicament of the old gentleman who cannot get any satisfaction out of reading the dictionary because it changes the subject too often. It is tickled by the tale of the village politician who craved a postmastership within easy walking distance of the distillery; of how Colonel Mullinix got religion at the Free-Will Baptists revival, only to lose it again when his buggy bounced down a couple of ledge boulders and broke a left fore-wheel; and of how Parson Milsap absent-mindedly ate a minx in place of a gray squirrel.

The non-sequitur is another popular device in joke making. For example: "I knowed a feller once who was bald-headed. Not a hair on his head nowhere. And yet that feller could play alto solos better than anybody in Post Oak."

"Flinnegin's cabin," runs one story, "used to have some mighty worthless back steps and the women folks that lives there kept on fallin' down 'em. Pert's wife did. Then the Widder Barns come there to live and she fell, and then Mollie Cunningham she fell down 'em, too. So Pert named the place the house of fallen women."

The run of backwoods humor is gentle. It may be brusque but it is seldom bitter or vengeful. Ordinarily a hillman jokes for the fun of so doing, and not to the end of selling suburban real estate, or to acquire office, or swarm with the village social bees. He laughs because the spirit of laughter is within him.

SARATOGA LOOKS FORWARD TO A NEW ERA

Its Development as a Spa May Eclipse Its Fame As a Racing Centre

By R. L. DUFFUS

TO most Americans the name Saratoga probably suggests the races held annually in the month of August under the auspices of an organization officially known as the Saratoga Association for the Improvement of the Breed of Horses. The association has been improving horses for nearly seventy years. It improves them under circumstances which attract to the little town every year throngs of the fashionable, the well-to-do, the speculative and the cannily enterprising. August is Saratoga's big month. The community probably earns more in August than it does during the rest of the year.

But Saratoga has another side. It has the famous springs which first made it nationally known. And 1930, which has brought a State appropriation of $1,000,000, with promises of several million more, for the first scientific development of the springs, may be the last year in which the races will play first fiddle. That there will be races at Saratoga to the end of time no lover of horses doubts. But from now on the springs will be more and more to the fore. Saratoga is about to become, in the European sense, a spa. And because of this new stage in its evolution it is worth while to consider what it has been, what it is and what it may—indeed, what it must—become.

I—The Early Saratoga.

THE springs were there first because nature, not man, put them there. In all there are more than 150 of them, some sweet, some charged with various salts and alkalis and naturally carbonated as they flow from the ground. Long before the white man came the Indians discovered that water which had a queer taste often possessed curative properties. They used the springs and named them. They are said to have carried their friend and patron, Sir William Johnson, to Saratoga in 1767, and he is said to have been benefited by the waters. Six years later, it is believed, one Dirk Scott built a log cabin in the vicinity. Four years later—a year after the Declaration of Independence—John Arnold built a tavern not far from the springs and offered entertainment for man and beast. In the Fall of that year Burgoyne came past, to meet his unhappy destiny at the near-by battlefield. General Philip Schuyler, who helped defeat Burgoyne, brought his family to the springs in the comparatively peaceful year of 1783 and spent the Summer there, camping out.

In the piping years of peace the fame of the Saratoga waters spread. No one knew exactly why it was good to drink them. To this day it is said that only about 2 per cent of the hydropathic treatments given at the springs are on doctors' prescriptions. This, incidentally, is a state of affairs which will soon be remedied. But the springs did some good to many people and they furnished an excuse for visiting a pleasant place. The old Union Hotel was built in 1802.

In 1827 some 900 persons spent all or part of the Summer at Saratoga. This was the real beginning of the boom. The place became fashionable. In the halcyon days before the Civil War Southern aristocrats and Northern exquisites mingled there, as they did at Newport. There was no organized racing then but there was a stately social life. Ladies, being accustomed then as now to wearing what fashion told them to, appeared in crinolines. Gentlemen wore long coats, strapped trousers and a profuse growth of whiskers. Lazy days went by. No one tried to stop them. For those who could afford it the period was a leisurely one.

The war eliminated the Southerners for a decade. Some, fallen in battle or ruined by the confiscation of their property, did not come back. But early in the '70s racing began to flourish. The racing provided a species of excitement that even in the Victorian era was welcomed. Huge hotels were built and burned down and were rebuilt. The rooms and furnishings were large and luxurious, even in such details as the pitchers and washbowls for which dark-hued servants brought water when it happened to be needed. There were long corridors and great dining rooms and ballrooms handsomely illuminated by gas. There were porches on which the élite of the nation—no other phrase could fittingly describe those resplendent personages of both sexes—rocked, discussed politics, business and horses, and, of course, gossiped. Grant, Harrison, Chester A. Arthur, Commodore Vanderbilt and other eminent men were the observed of all observers, and the loveliest ladies then to be found rustled about in voluminous silks, the more daring of them displaying a pretty ankle now and then.

If one took one's social position seriously, as most people did in those days, if they had social position, it was necessary to be seen in Saratoga during the season. The staider families came in the late Spring and remained well into the Fall. There was none of the restless flitting around that characterizes modern Summer life. Many well-to-do families built themselves solid and imposing houses, with carriage entrances up which dashed many a handsome turnout. The houses in most cases are still there. Of course there was also a racetrack following, which did not rank high socially, but which consoled itself by making money on the races instead of losing it.

The springs were important; so important that when certain enterprising manufacturers began to extract and bottle the carbonic acid gas and the waters—relieved of the pressure created by the gas—ceased to flow, the town sank into the doldrums. That was the end of the golden days, that and the coming of the automobile. The automobile set centrifugal forces whirling in Saratoga, as in every other Summer resort. The people who used to stroll along the shady streets or recline on the porches upon their vertebrae took to reclining instead in high-powered motor cars. There was more excitement than formerly, and it was spread over a larger area.

II—The Resort of Today.

NOTHING could be done about the automobile. Nobody wanted to do anything about it, except to procure faster and prettier machines. But something could be done about the waters, and under the leadership of George Foster Peabody and Spencer Trask something was done. In 1909 the State bought the springs, and in 1916 the Conservation Commission began the task of nursing them back to life. This was not the easiest thing in the world, but the accumulation of carbonic acid gas finally brought them back to the old levels. In Lincoln Park two bathhouses, the Lincoln and the Washington, were constructed and equipped with modern appliances for giving baths, rubs, massages and other hydropathic treatments. The one-millionth treatment will be given some time this Summer, if it has not already been given. The number of baths and treatments given in a single season has increased more

NEW ERA FOR SARATOGA

Baruch, had much to do with the earlier development of the baths. A careful study of the Saratoga waters and of European watering places was made, with the cooperation of the Academy of Medicine. The results were all that the most devoted partisan of the springs could have hoped for. Nature has done all that is necessary to make Saratoga one of the most successful spas in the world. All that is needed is intelligent use of what is already there—a use carried as far as possible by the present management but necessarily restricted by lack of funds.

As Governor Roosevelt stated in his message to the Legislature last Winter the plan is to make the springs not "a glorified playground" but "a great health-giving agency for the people of the State of New York." It is expected that a qualified medical director will have general charge, so that all treatments may be given after proper examination of each patient; that laboratories for research into the curative properties of the waters and their application to specific diseases will be established; that private sanatoriums will be permitted under proper regulation; that a new bottling plant will take the place of the one now operated, and that some of the social features of the European spas, such as drink-halls, concerts and attractive promenades, will be provided.

It has been found elsewhere that music, agreeable diversions and a pleasant social life are as important a part of the "cure" as the waters themselves. Of these subsidiaries Saratoga Springs has, for the most part, had very little. The grounds are beautifully laid out and well kept and the buildings are sufficiently attractive, but the atmosphere of foreign watering places has been lacking. And it is doubtless this very defect that has led many Americans to go abroad to drink foreign waters when the waters of Saratoga were as good and possibly even better. The extent of the business done at foreign spas, with Americans alone has been estimated at $150,000,000 a year. This is a resource that the Saratoga of the future will be able to tap, though not to any large extent for private profit.

The Saratoga waters contain many constituents common to a number of springs, but in some respects they are believed to be unique. One is the presence of iron salts in a form "apparently identical with the form in which iron salts exist in the human blood." This makes them useful, to take a single instance, in the treatment of anemia. Sodium, calcium, magnesium and other salts, together with radioactive substances, are also highly important. Diseases of the heart and circulatory system, neurasthenia, gout, arthritis, diabetes and a weakened condition resulting from various ailments seem to be benefited by the treatments. The practical results are now unquestioned. The how and why still require investigation.

The springs in coming years will undoubtedly be a far gayer place than they have been in the past, despite the fact that they will be much resorted to by invalidism and old age. There is no reason why they should not be kept open the year around, so that there will be no dead season. They may well attract patients as well as people who desire a few weeks of restful surroundings, not only from New York but from some other States and even from foreign countries. Fashion may give them tone, as it does European spas, though it would be entirely contrary to the spirit of the place to permit discrimination against the poor and needy. Saratoga may be brilliant, but it will always be democratic.

Do I look like an Enthusiast? I AM!

Listerine usually removes loose dandruff in 3 days

DOWN at the office the men under me say I'm a kill-joy. I seldom get enthusiastic about anything. But I want to tell you about my experience getting rid of dandruff. I have always had a good head of hair, and when I first began to be troubled by dandruff, I felt pretty worried. It's a humiliating thing at best. You feel guilty with those telltale flakes on your coat collar. Sort of ashamed to meet people. It's bad business.

Of course, the first thing I did was to go to my barber. "Nothing to it," he said. "I'll have you over that in a couple of weeks." You have probably heard that line yourself. Well, I let him wreak his vengeance on my scalp and hair with a lot of funny treatments that were a nuisance. Net result: just as much dandruff, if not more. Net loss: $12.

Then somebody said, "See a specialist."

Well, what that fellow did to my scalp was worse than the great war itself. He thumped it. He beat it. He photographed it. He rubbed it. He anointed it. He baked it. He dried it. He fanned it. Net cost: $25. And give him some credit—he did get rid of the dandruff—but only for a little while.

Then one morning my wife said to me, "Everett," she said, "why don't you try Listerine? A lot of the girls at the club have tried it and they say it gets rid of ordinary loose dandruff in no time."

Well, sir, I tried it. Just doused it on full strength, as they say in their ads, and massaged the scalp with the finger tips. And, by George, after the first treatment dandruff began to disappear. Right away my scalp began to feel like a million dollars. After another treatment, I couldn't find any dandruff at all, and my scalp was just as cool and healthy as a baby's. None of that old itching and burning. Net cost: 50c. What's more, dandruff hasn't returned. Can you blame me for being enthusiastic about Listerine?

You can understand Listerine's success against dandruff when you realize that dandruff is a germ disease, and full strength Listerine kills germs in 15 seconds. Even the Staphylococcus Aureus (pus) and Bacillus Typhosus (typhoid) yield to it in counts ranging to 200,000,000.

Listerine first dislodges and dissolves the tiny scales which are the outward evidence of dandruff, then it soothes, cools, and heals the troubled scalp. The flesh tingles and glows with new health and invigoration.

If you have any evidence of this humiliating and dangerous condition, begin with Listerine at once. Remember that it is entirely safe, and douse it on the scalp full strength, then massage vigorously with the finger tips. Keep the treatment up as a part of the regular soap and water shampoo, or independent of it, until dandruff is under control. Lambert Pharm. Co., St. Louis.

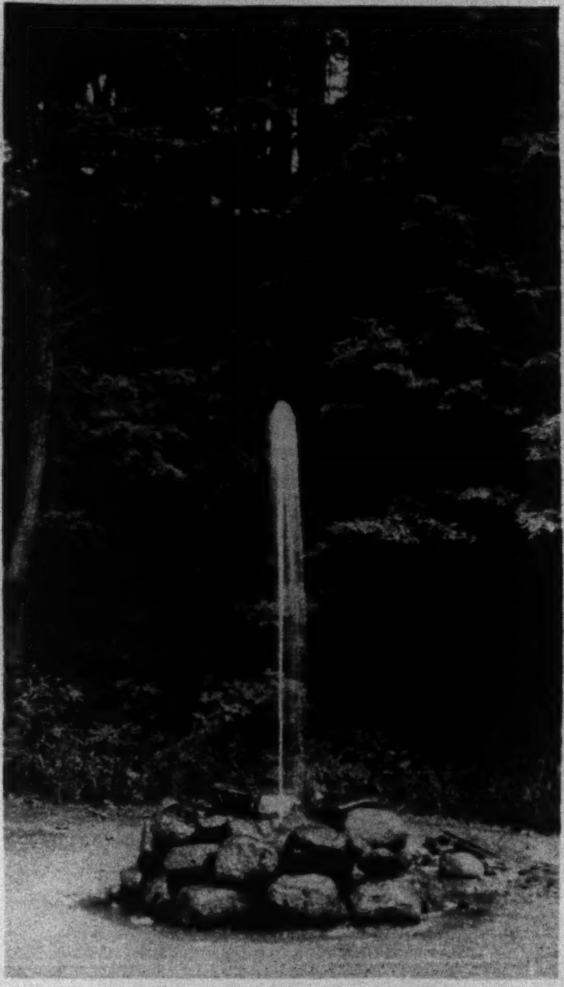
than ten times over since the war. The capacity now, on the eve of the forthcoming expansion, is about 5,000 baths and treatments a day, or about 1,000 more than the capacity of the Bad Nauheim in Germany. The patients pay on an average $1 each, which means that some pay more, some pay less and some who need treatment but are without means pay nothing at all. There is no difference in the baths, no matter how much or how little one pays. The difference is in the privacy and small luxuries which go with the treatments.

Many come to drink the waters, regardless of whether or not they take treatments. In most cases they decide for themselves what they like or what is good for them and then line up at the spring where their favorite fluid can be found. It is a real line-up, for the practice is to drink copiously before breakfast and then stroll about for an hour before eating. The 1,100-acre park owned by the State, in which the springs lie, invites strolling. It is one of the most beautiful in the East. To the native hardwoods have been added plantations of pine. The park is a natural basin, with a hump in the middle which conveniently separates the fresh waters from the saline and alkaline. To the west, north and east hills roll up toward distant mountains. There is at once an agreeable intimacy in the landscape and a sense of far vistas. No European spa, so say those who have studied the matter, is more beautifully located.

Yet the Spa itself cannot be said to be fashionable. Wealth and fashion come to the races, not to the springs. The racing fraternity has its favorite beverages, but they do not come out of holes in the ground. Rather do they come, under favorable circumstances, over the Canadian line or "off a steward off a boat." But the character of racing has changed somewhat since the old days. Like the noble art of fisticuffs, it has taken on respectability. Or rather, since racing itself was always an innocent and wholesome amusement, the practice of betting on horses, which is what draws most visitors to Saratoga during the season, has acquired a reasonably good repute. Everybody indulges in it on a small or large scale, including the daughters and granddaughters and perhaps great-granddaughters of the fair but inhibited ladies in crinoline and stays who came to Saratoga in years long gone by.

The Saratoga track on a fine afternoon is a sight that no one in search of the picturesque aspects of American life ought to miss. Perhaps Fashion with the large initial letter has gone into the discard since the World War, but fashions, as one readily sees in observing the crowds in the stands and against the paddock, certainly have not. Here is the modern girl in all her swirl of color, parading, posing, at times forgetting herself in the excitement of the contest. There seems to be an unwritten law against permitting dowdy or unattractive women to attend the horse races at Saratoga. Some of the men are almost as gay. They dazzle the eyes with violently colored shirts, neckties, hatbands and sweaters. And there are male complexions whose reds and purples could only have been attained by years of intensive eating and drinking. Then the horses come out, the flag drops and the crowd is intent on the beautiful, sleek movements, the rhythmic flash of legs and beat of hoofs. So our simian ancestors — if simian they were—watched the wild horses, with their proud heads and flowing manes and tails, sweep through the forest. The crowd at Saratoga, though it does not throw cocoanuts, makes as much noise as a whole forestful of monkeys.



Polaris Spring in Geyser Park.

In the evening Saratoga's streets glow softly and people still sit on hotel porches, dance in the ballrooms or stroll under the elms. They gamble, too, though Colonel Dick Canfield's establishment, where none but gentlemen, and well-heeled gentlemen at that, could enter, has long been a memory. Occasionally there are crusades against gambling in and around Saratoga. Governor Smith undertook one. But in the long run one might as well crusade against hot weather. And in August no one dies of thirst, even though his stomach will not tolerate water. But when the races are over the little community relaxes. Dwindling lines are still to be found at the springs every morning. But the leaves of Saratoga's brief Summer season are beginning to feel the frost and soon will fall.

III—A Forecast.

THE future holds a different picture, and one more striking than the stately past or the jazzy present. Though during the last decade and a half remarkable progress has been made in the development of the springs, the money was lacking to do full justice to them. The new program is based upon recommendations made by a commission headed by Bernard M. Baruch, whose father, Dr. Simon

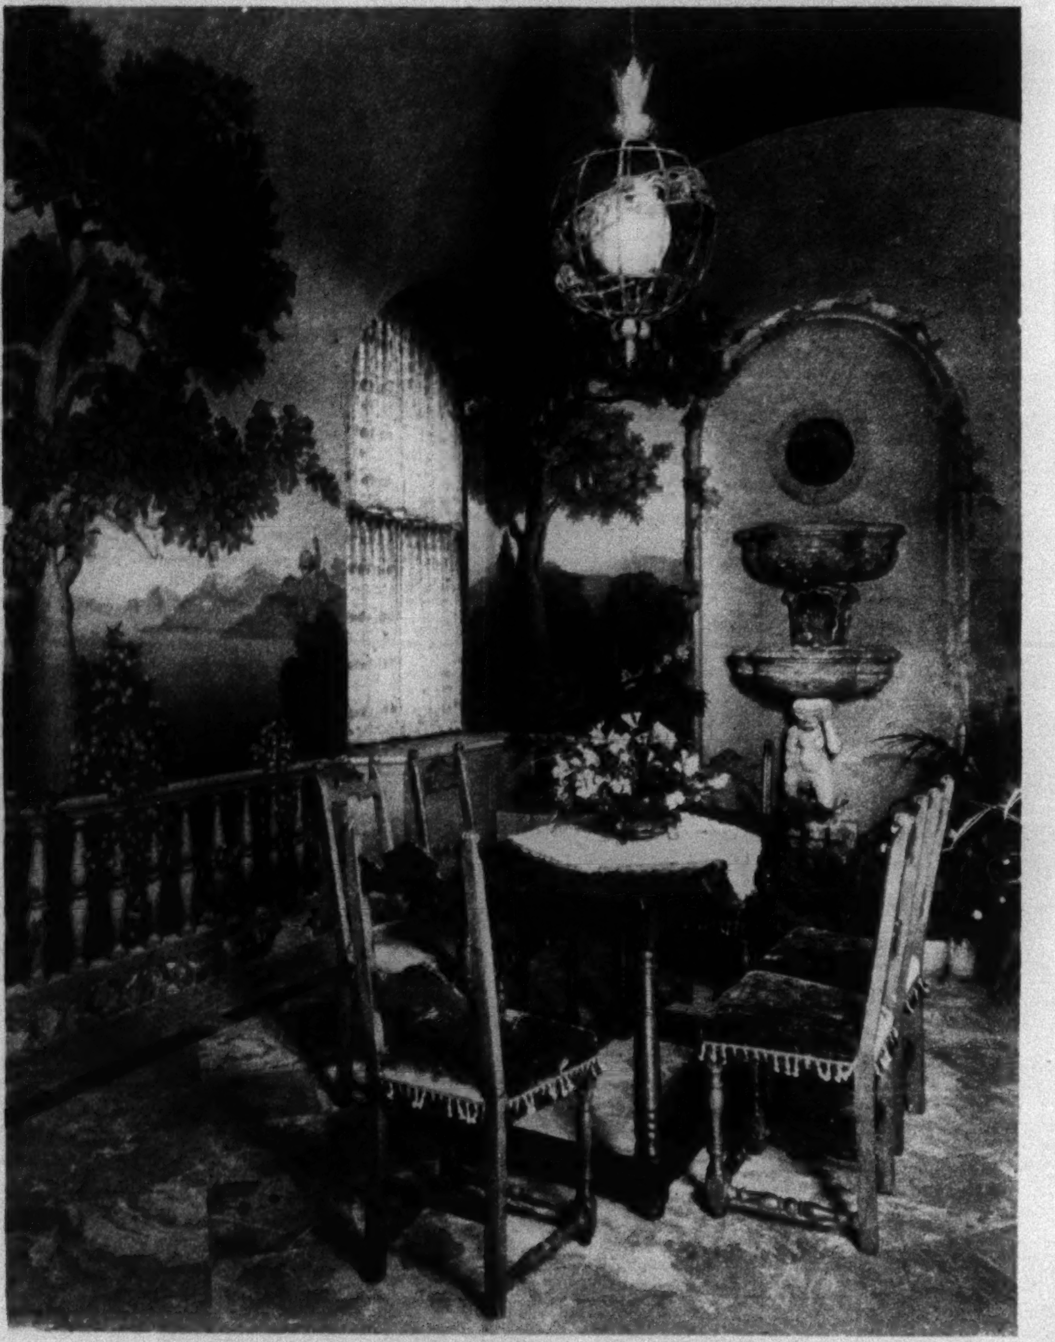
SUMMER'S INFORMAL NOTE IN DECORATION

Crisp Linens and Chintzes, Replacing Heavy Draperies, Bring the Spirit Of Outdoors Into the Home



An Italian Breakfast Room in the Heart of Steel-Ribbed New York.

By VIRGINIA POPE

THE Summer is the season of informalities. The rigidity of social habits is cast aside to conform to the demands of outdoor life and sport. Dwellings—whether they be ostentatious homes on Long Island or at Newport, or skyscraper apartments high above the city streets—reflect the mood. They are decked to meet the season.

Heavy draperies vanish. Dark upholstery disappears under the fresh crispness of chintzes and linens. Flower patterns bloom where somber hues held sway. Cool greens, blues and yellows prevail, suggesting sky, sea and golden sunshine. The outdoor spirit is brought indoors.

No other room reflects the joyous fragrance of the warm months as much as the dining room. In the country house it is always filled with blossoms. In the city apartment it profits by the innumerable modern devices that make fresh greenery a part of the general decorative scheme. More and more Americans are acquiring the European's love of open-air meals. It may be a throw-back, or perhaps the result of new habits learned through foreign travel. However that may be, the semi-out-of-doors dining room is growing in popularity. It has almost as many forms of expression as there are individuals building country homes.

The informal dining room is sometimes no more than a screened-in terrace, opening from a formal dining room; yet it fits into the decorative plan of the living apartments. For example, in a house of moderate size, standing on a promontory on the Connecticut side of the Sound the furnishings are a modern interpretation of early American. Around an oblong table of white pine stand ladder-back chairs. In a corner of the room is a miniature reproduction of table and chairs, constructed specially for the children of the house. Over the mantle hangs a recent version of the countryside map executed in the style of the Colonials, while on the opposite wall hangs a painting of a frigate in full sail.

Ruby finger bowls, bulbous as balloons, stand on the sideboard, striking the high color note of the room. A step leads down to the stone-flagged fair-weather dining room. It commands a view of the Sound, whose waters are visible over the breeze-tossed blossoms of an old-fashioned garden. The semi-terrace is devoid of frills and furbelows. Against one wall, so that it looks out into the garden, is a long bench, in front of which stands a refectory table, unornamented save for a well-worn foot-rest. Table and chairs are a modified edition of those in the large dining room.

More popular is the breakfast and lunch room that forms an integral part of the house, being enclosed within its walls, which, however, counterfeit an outdoor appearance. It is papered or painted in imitation of the French and English custom of a hundred years and more ago. An infinite variety of patterns are laid against a ground of blue or green, and even cream color. As one moves from the dignified rooms of the sophisticated country house into the cool breakfast room, with its atmosphere of sans gêne. it is as though one entered a bower of flowers, on whose branches exotic birds swing. The illusion is further carried out by the long French doors or windows opening onto green lawns flecked with the restless shadows of dancing foliage. Tiled floors, occasionally of a solid color, strengthen the link between house and garden.

Houses having a breakfast and lunch room boast of a certain pretentiousness, for there is always, in addition, a formal dining room used for the evening or for the entertainments which are taking an ever more important place in the social life of American Summer colonies. The less ostentatious room is in many instances what might be called the country cousin of the more impressive apartment from which it opens. If the larger room is furnished in dignified Sheraton, the smaller room is likely to be provided with table and chairs of the cottage type. If the dining room recalls the Versailles of Louis XVI, the breakfast room is reminiscent of the Trianon.

AN unusual combination of formal and informal has been introduced in a handsome Italian villa on the Jersey coast. It has but one dining room and that a large one, running the depth of the house. An alcoved window reaches out into the garden and commands a view of the ocean. The vast hall is simply treated, its ceiling beamed, its plastered walls tinted a light rose. A wide stone fireplace is one of its most ornamental features. The size of the room suggests a double use, formal and informal. Stone columns were set on either side of the embrasure to mark a break between it and the major portion of the room. Down the centre of the larger section runs a seventeenth-century refectory table, its walnut top darkened with age. Around it stand Savanarola chairs covered with antiqued velvet of olive green. These, with the tall iron sconces on either side of the fireplace, suggest resplendent banquets, filet lace and luminous silver. It is far too imposing a place

ON DON QUIXOTE'S TRAIL IN LA MANCHA

By T. R. YBARRA

MADRID.

CERVANTES tells us that Don Quixote of La Mancha, the immortal Knight of the Rueful Countenance, went out, seeking other knights to unhorse and wrongs to right, mounted upon Rocinante, a nag of lean frame and melancholy eye, and attended by Sancho Panza, his squire, astride a donkey. But times have changed—even in Spain. We journeyed into La Mancha on the comfortable cushions of a gasoline-driven Rocinante, made in Detroit, attended not by a squire called Sancho but by a chauffeur called Paco.

We had come in two hours over the seventy-five miles from Madrid—a distance which the original Rocinante could scarcely have covered in a week. And now we were in the heart of La Mancha, the scene of Don Quixote's chivalrous adventures, and Paco, bringing Rocinate-from-Detroit to a stop by the roadside, asked a passing Castilian peasant, in blue smock, corduroy trousers and dusty sandals, a question that doubtless came often from the lips of Sancho:

"Pardon me, señor, but would you be so good as to tell me how to get to El Toboso?"

"The second road to the right," answered the peasant, "is the road to El Toboso."

"Muchas gracias," said Paco politely. And we, seated behind him, echoed his "muchas gracias," and, presently, Rocinante-from-Detroit turned sharply toward the right and made for a little town straggling across the horizon—a typical little Manchegan town, fringed with dull red fields and flaming red poppies, a town of poverty-stricken white houses, of barred windows and sagging balconies and melancholy and mustiness, dominated by a huge church, unpainted and crumbling, pointing gauntly toward the sky.

El Toboso! So El Toboso existed after all, in a reality of masonry and silent streets and mournful plaza, instead of merely in the imagination of Miguel de Cervantes! El Toboso! The home of that humble peasant girl, Aldonza Lorenzo, whom Don Quixote, having endowed her with the impressive name of Dulcinea del Toboso, made the empress of his heart and the inspiration of his valorous feats of arms. Here, then, was her home; here, in one of these tumbledown houses, she—but enough! It behooved us not to forget that Dulcinea was a purely fictitious character. So we entered El Toboso, looking and seeking to feel as unromantic as possible. "Dulcinea was purely fictitious," we told ourselves. Well, she might be fictitious in our minds and those of the world at large, but not in the minds of the people living in El Toboso in 1930.

"Here," said Don Jaime, ex-Mayor of El Toboso and head of the committee which has taken upon itself to encourage tourists to visit the town of the lovely Dulcinea, "is the house where Dulcinea lived. Here is the house where members of her family lived—note the escutcheon over the door. Here [he had now led us into the church] is the tomb of Don Antonio Zarco de Morales, the brother of Dulcinea. For her name, I would have you know, was Zarco de Morales and she belonged to a leading family of La Mancha."

Yes, El Toboso has not only found that Dulcinea really lived but that she was a noblewoman. Cervantes explicitly states that she was a peasant, but what of it? Cervantes was merely a scribbler, who sought his material in La Mancha and made a lot of mistakes in what he wrote. El Toboso knows much more than he did about Dulcinea. Did not Don Qnixote deem her a princess? Well, he was not far wrong, and not mad at all, as Cervantes sought to prove him.

That is the unanimous verdict of El Toboso. Woe to the casual visitor who disputes it. We did not dispute it. Instead, we nodded sympathetically and followed Don Jaime, who had been joined by this time by his nephew and a mysterious individual in a coat with "A. M." on the lapel, into the "Biblioteca Cervantina," over which Don Jaime presides by virtue of being the most enthusiastic champion in the town of the reality and nobility of Dulcinea. Outside, silently watching over Rocinante-from-Detroit, Paco waited with the patience of a Sancho Panza.

IT is my aim," said Don Jaime, "to have the head of the government of every nation in the world send to this Cervantes Library of El Toboso an autographed copy of a 'Don Quixote,' published in his country. Already I have one such." He took from a shelf a richly-bound copy of "Don Quixote" in German. Across the fly-leaf was inscribed: "This copy of the immortal work of Cervantes, translated into the language of Goethe, I dedicate to the library of El Toboso." And below, in a firm, bold hand: "Von Hindenburg."

"I am proud of that book," said Don Jaime. "Von Hindenburg sent it to me because, when the Zeppelin made its first flight from Germany to Spain not long ago, I wrote him a letter of congratulation. And now, tell me, do you think—?" He drew close to us, with a most confidential air, while his nephew and the man labeled "A. M." listened eagerly on the outskirts of our group.

"Do you think," almost whispered Don Jaime, "that you could get President Hoover to send us an autographed copy of a 'Don Quixote' published in the United States?"

"We will do our best," said we, impressively.

"Muchas gracias," said Don Jaime. The nephew nodded his thanks. So did the man marked "A. M."

Feeling that we had taken upon ourselves a tremendous responsibility, we walked out into the streets of El Toboso. By this time it was drizzling, so Don Jaime and his nephew and "A. M." plodded along beside us, holding umbrellas over our heads. The nephew, by the way, had found time to disappear into the house, while the Hoover negotiations were under way. He emerged wearing a handsome badge bearing the inscription in Spanish: "Committee for the Encouragement of Tourist Travel to El Toboso."

Around the corner we came upon a little plaza, and there in the middle of it was—yes!—a windmill—a genuine Quixotesque windmill, looking as if it were in constant expectation of being speared by the bellicose Knight of La Mancha. We were delighted.

"Old, of course?" we queried.

"Not at all," said Don Jaime. "When I was Mayor, I decided that nothing was more typical of La Mancha than a windmill and that El Toboso should most certainly have one. So I built it."

"And what is it used for?" we asked.

"A bar," answered Don Jaime.

A moment later we had climbed upon Rocinante-from-Detroit and were exchanging courteous bows of farewell with Don Jaime and his nephew and the man marked "A. M."—which letters, we had learned in the meantime, stood for "Ayuntamiento Municipal" or "Town Council." Probably "A. M." had joined us to lend an official air to our reception. All three bowed politely, while Rocinante-from-Detroit, with a chug and a snort, speeded out of El Toboso into the open country.

SOON the town of Dulcinea, with its fringe of dull red fields and flaming red poppies, vanished behind a hillock. We were deep in the heart of La Mancha, amid silent, rolling wheat-lands, stretching toward barren ridges and purplish mountains on the gray horizon. Sturdy, besmocked Castilian country-folk eyed us—pausing a moment from tilling the fields or drawing water or plodding along the road, exactly as their ancestors of Cervantes's pages had tilled and drawn and plodded when Don Quixote jogged past, in rusty armor and holding aloft his rusty lance, finding on every hand opportunity for high adventure, despite the frantic attempts of Sancho to get him back into the cold world of reality.

And suddenly, as if to convince us, once for all, that we were living in the past and likely to encounter the Knight of the Rueful Countenance and his squire any minute, we rounded a corner and came upon—windmills! Real ones this time, old ones, plenty of them, dotted along the horizon before us. They appeared suddenly, exactly as they had appeared to Don Quixote, when he thought them wicked giants waving gigantic arms and charged full-tilt against them, only to be unhorsed, get some of the first of his many bruises and suffer one of the first of his many disillusionments. There they were, the windmills of Criptana, waving impudent arms at us, daring us to drive Rocinante-from-Detroit against them, as Don Quixote had driven Rocinante of the melancholy eye. But—alas!—we were living in a craven age. We had been traveling for many miles. We were tired. We were hungry. Bestowing upon the windmills of Criptana only a passing glance, we commanded Sancho-Paco:

"Head for Alcázar de San Juan. We shall lunch there."

More fields of reddish-brown, dotted with sparse yellow crops; more carpets of poppies, touching their somber surroundings with a sudden blaze of colors; more windmills, most of them in ruins, crowning the heights to right and left; more country folk, seamed, sunburned and sturdy, eyeing us with that tinge of reserve which never leaves a Castilian be he hidalgo or laborer. Now and then flocks passed over fields and road—goats or sheep, mingled with horses and donkeys, flanked by dusty dogs, the rear brought up by shepherds biblical in their primitiveness. And, above, across the sky, stretched masses of gray clouds, grouping themselves into fantastic effects over the dull, flat expanse of land beneath. "Is it any wonder," wrote a famous Spanish author who once followed in the footsteps of Don Quixote, "that men go mad in La Mancha? Is it any wonder that La Mancha produced the divine madman, the greatest lunatic of all lunatics?"

And yet there is charm about La Mancha, a fascination hard to put into words. And there is a sense of solidarity with landscape and people which comes over even transient, speeding motorists. For example, as we sped through a dusty town, a youth rushed out of a hovel and imperiously beckoned Paco to stop. Paco stopped.

"Going to Alcázar de San Juan, aren't you?" inquired the youth.

"Yes," said Paco. The youth handed him a bundle.

"Will you have the goodness to deliver this at Pancho's bar, to the left, as you enter the town? Somebody will be there, expecting it. Thank you, señor."

The youth disappeared as suddenly as he had appeared. Paco looked at us and nodded disparagingly toward the bundle, as much as to say: "Haven't these Manchegans a dreadful nerve?" But it never occurred to him to refuse to carry the bundle. Nor did it occur to us. We were under a sort of Quixotic spell. Off chugged Rocinante-from-Detroit.

Alcázar de San Juan is in the very centre of La Mancha and as typical a Manchegan town as you can find. It claims to be the birth-

SYMBOLS OF POWER REVERED BY BRITAIN

By P. W. WILSON

WITH India all upset, with battleships speeding to a riotous Alexandria, and with Malta in a muddle, it is doubtless mystifying to Americans that the one and only circumstance at which the face of Ramsay MacDonald as Britain's Prime Minister has been blanched with horror was the impulsive gesture of an otherwise harmless Labor member, bearing the saintly if turbulent name of Beckett, who, after eloping recently to Gretna Green with an actress, endeavored also to run off with the mace of the House of Commons. Women have chained themselves to a now abolished grille in front of their gallery; others have dropped bags of flour on legislators below them; Fenians have startled the echoes of the House, at any rate, with bombs, and Zeppelins have released a serenade from the sky above. But to lay unholy hands on the mace! Unthinkable! It is not done.

Exhibited in the glass case of a museum, the mace of the House of Commons would be no more than an interesting example of what a silversmith in London called Thomas Maundy could produce, with gilding added, in 1649. Indeed, it is not even that. For maces suffer from attrition. No mace can be in constant use for nearly three centuries, being handled, carried across the shoulder and cleaned, without losing weight; and this mace has lost several ounces.

Yet, for some reason, the mace seems to have gained in importance all and more than all that it has sacrificed to duty. So formidable is the taboo that surrounds the relic that for impious hands to touch it is no mere breach of Parliamentary etiquette, however audacious. It is one of those unpardonable offenses against decorum which cannot be mentioned in polite society without a shudder.

It is not the intrinsic value of the mace that matters. Admittedly, this value is not great. If, then, the whole world is interested in the recent episode, it is because of what the mace as an emblem now signifies. In the Jerusalem of King Hezekiah there was an old and ill-shaped brazen serpent. To some people it was merely the bauble that the mace was to Oliver Cromwell; "hehushtan," they called it, a bit of junk, and they broke it up. But to others that brazen serpent was a symbol of salvation so venerated for centuries, and as such they worshiped it.

IN manners and customs, in law, finance, literature, belief and the Constitution itself, England progressed. But in forms and ceremonies a change to her is sheer anarchy. To this day the King's assent to new statutes is intimated in Norman French. To this day members in the Commons bow not to the Speaker, as is supposed, but to an imaginary sacrament, reserved as it used to be before the Reformation, on an altar at the east end of St. Stephen's Chapel, where the House met. To this day there are woolsacks in the House of Lords, first set there in the reign of Queen Elizabeth to remind the peers that wool, of which the export had been prohibited, was the basis of the national wealth.

To this day the Beefeaters of the Tower search the vaults of the Palace of Westminster before the opening of Parliament in order to discover some later Guy Fawkes and a gunpowder plot. To this day no message can be sent to the Commons by the King through the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod without the doors being shut in his face as a precaution against a further attempt by his Majesty, after the manner of King Charles I, to arrest five members. War and revolution have swept Europe, but of these ancient forms not one has been altered by so much as the most minute detail.

Read "the form and order" of the King's coronation and we are amazed by this apparent perpetuation of chivalric autocracy. Not only is the King crowned, but he is anointed, girded as a knight, presented with his spurs and his swords, his orb and his sceptres, his ring and his robes. Holding a Parliamentary title to his throne, he is surrounded with all the ceremonial of divine right. When the next coronation comes, so will it be again.

In seizing the mace, it was this deep subconscious reverence for the past, shared by all parties and classes in England, that the offender defied. Over the politics of the moment, let men differ. But however deep the difference, let them respect that heritage of which all of them alike are trustees. In the shouts of anger, the clamorous demands for retribution and apology, the latent memories of a thousand years of vivid history were stirred from slumber. Parties are phases. But the mace is continuous. Burke is its guardian, and Chatham, and Fox; they rise from their graves, and with the Peels and the Gladstones, John Bright and Disraeli, they say to the extremist, "Thus far shalt thou go, but no further."

In defining the symbolism of the mace, there has been displayed recently some lack of acquaintance with the facts. It is true that the mace accompanies the Speaker. But it is not true that the mace lies on the table only when the Speaker is in the chair. If the Deputy Speaker or any other substitute were presiding over the House in session, the mace would be exposed.

Nor is the mace as an emblem attached especially to the Speaker's office. Lord Mayors and Mayors have maces. Certain of the universities have maces. The Parliaments of the dominions have maces. At Holyrood there is the mace of the Lord High Treasurer of Scotland, and, last but not least, certain American Colonies – for instance, Virginia and South Carolina—still preserve the maces that they used before the Revolution. In an insult to the mace there is involved a far deeper blasphemy than would be suggested by one of the many tiffs with the Chair by which it is the habit of excitable members to entertain a grateful community.

By derivation, the word mace means, and is akin to, the word mallet, and curriers still use a "mace" to soften hides. But in the tapestries of Bayeux—to offer one reference—we note that long before the mace became a symbol, still less a bauble, it had been used as a weapon. A bishop, like Odo the Norman, wished to play his part in battle. By canonical law, he was forbidden as a prelate to shed blood. Hence, he brandished not a sword, but a mace. For a cut, there would be penance. But a blow on the other man's helmet was at once strictly ecclesiastical and no less effective on that account.

Yet, strictly speaking, it would not be true to say that the pallor on the cheek and lips of Prime Minister MacDonald was due to the intensity of his solicitude for the military susceptibilities of Odo, Bishop of Bayeux. The mace is useful not only as a weapon of religion but also it has a meaning, deeper by far than any such medieval precedent.

In the twelfth century Kings liked to be safe. Hence, it is believed, Richard Coeur de Lion, among others, organized a bodyguard around the royal person, a kind of household regiment, whose soldiers were called his sergeants-at-arms. Like the police in New York, they carried maces, and today his Majesty King George retains ten of these protective warriors. He lends one of them to the Lord Chancellor as a warning to obstreperous Marquises. He lends another sergeant-at-arms to the Speaker as a no less prudent precaution against the occasional rioting that interrupts the sagacity of the House of Commons. It is this sergeant-at-arms whose most formidable bludgeon is still the mace.

Even the Commonwealth decided that, after all, there ought to be a mace, and its mace, indeed, is in part the mace now used. One change, however, had to be made. As the regicides cut off the head of King Charles I, and installed the Lord Protector, so did King Charles II cut off the head of the Lord Protector's mace and restore the royal emblems. In the fashionable game of decapitation, it was tit-for-tat.

Among the essentials of the British Constitution, the best advertised has been, doubtless, the Great Seal. If the Great Seal be lost, life in England ceases to be lived. Hence, the kindly thought in the mind of King James II when, at his emigration, he dropped the great seal into the River Thames. Hence, the alarm of Lord Chancellor Thurlow when, just as Pitt wanted to dissolve Parliament, the Great Seal disappeared from his house and was never recovered. Hence, the embarrassment of Lord Chancellor Eldon when, with his house burning and the maids in their nightrobes busily passing buckets of water to extinguish the flames, he buried the Great Seal in his garden, and then forgot where, which meant that his family had to spend most of the next day digging in the flower beds. When Lord Haldane visited America, so it is said, he hid the Great Seal with so Hegelian an ingenuity that nobody knew where to look for it.

But, however interesting may be the vicissitudes of the Great Seal, it stands as a symbol second to the mace. The seal is a signature, something that the King does. Hence, it is renewed at the accession of each sovereign who comes to the throne.

BUT the mace represents, not the sovereign as a person, but sovereignty as an abiding principle. The mace goes on forever, a permanent expression, like the eagles and fasces of Rome, of the safety and sanctity of ultimate authority in the realm, by whomsoever it may be exercised. If the Great Seal were absent, the House of Lords could sit. But not without the mace. So in the House of Commons. If the Speaker is ill, there are deputies who can take his place. But if the mace be mislaid, it has no deputy, and the entire business of the House is brought to an absolute standstill. On one occasion, the House attended a naval review at Spithead. Members returned by a special train in two sections, and it was in the second of these that the official who held the key of the mace cupboard found a seat. For a couple of hours, the sitting was delayed. In 1626 the House was in so great an uproar that the sergeant-at-arms tried to end the sitting by removing the mace. A member, Sir Miles Hobart, wrested it from his hands, replaced it on the table and locked the door of the House against the King's messenger. The sitting could thus continue.

True, the mace is sometimes deposited, politely but firmly, under the table of the House. But even this apparent humiliation is in reality a compliment. The mace stoops to conquer. During committee, even on budget day, the House as a House is not sitting, and the mace would be de trop. If it hides its lion and unicorn, its roses and shamrocks and thistles, its crown and garter and all the rest of its finery in comparative obscurity, the reason is that it has to be available immediately when, committee over, the House resumes. Over all such arrangements, the mace, while preserving its dignity, has never been unreasonable.

If then the latest outrage upon the mace had succeeded and inadvertently the captured booty had fallen over the terrace into the place of Cervantes and maintains its claim, with all the obduracy that is characteristic of La Mancha, in the teeth of excellent evidence to the contrary, backed by no less an authority than the Spanish Academy. The members of the Academy have decided that Cervantes was born many miles away, at Alcalá de Henares. But what cares Alcázar de San Juan for the chatterings of dry-as-dust "académicos"? In its church is a baptismal certificate of one Cervantes, with these words scribbled on the margin: "This is he who wrote 'Don Quixote.'" In vain have "académicos" pointed out that the existence of that marginal note is not proof that what it states is gospel truth; in vain have they brandished before the eyes of the inhabitants of Alcázar de San Juan not only the baptismal certificate of another Cervantes—Miguel de Cervantes—found in the church of Alcalá de Henares, but also statements by Cervantes himself that Alcalá was his birthplace. The Manchegans of Alcázar merely sneer. And for miles roundabout Alcázar de San Juan the title of "académico" is in enormous disrepute. "Born in Alcalá, indeed! Bah! Isn't that just like an 'académico?'"

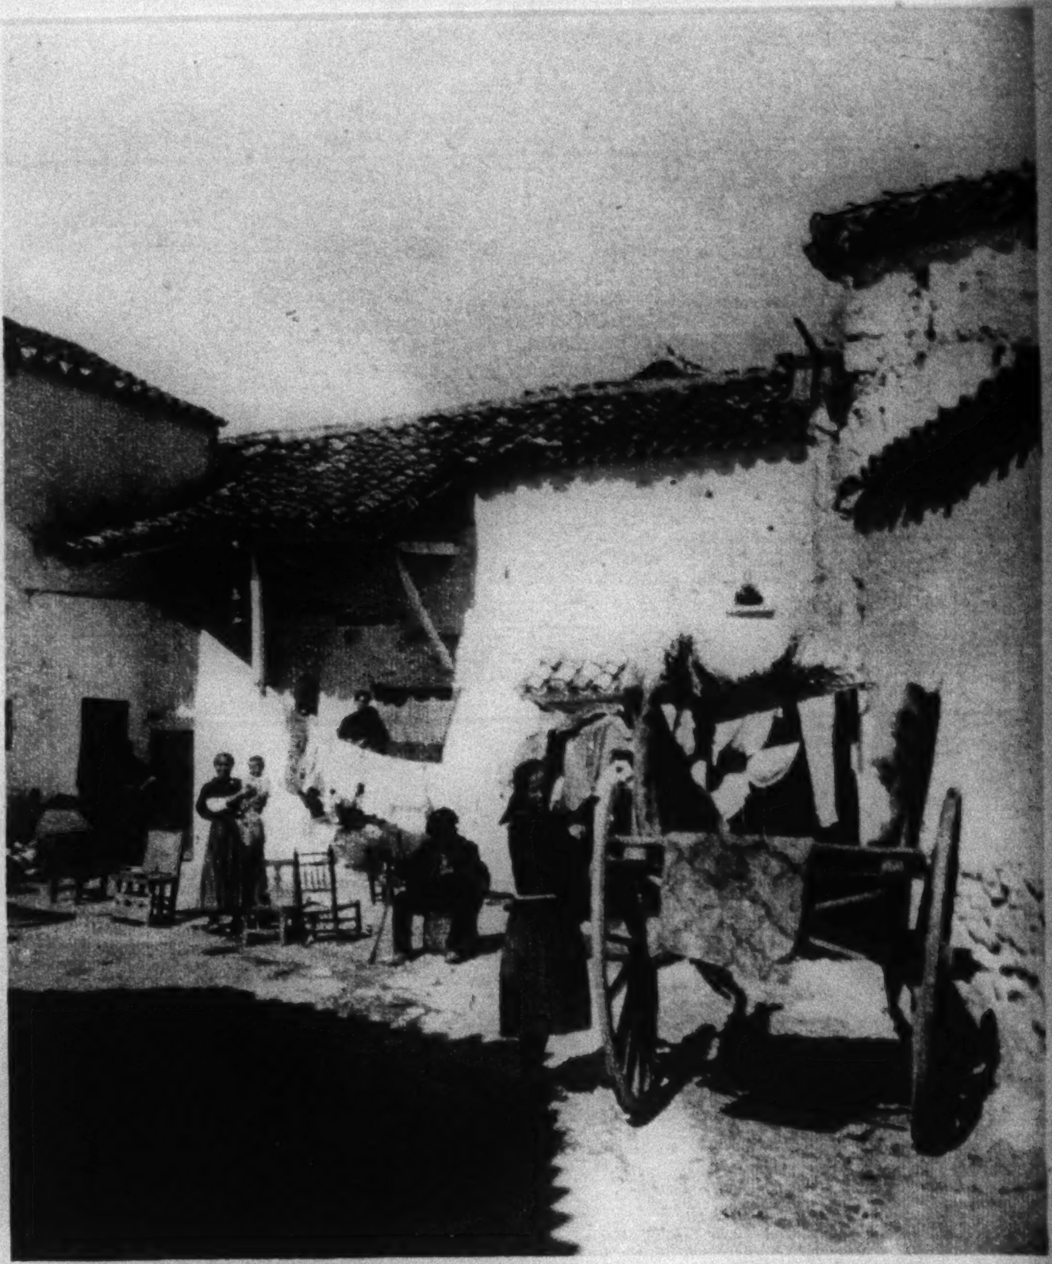
I SUPPOSE you are in a hurry to have lunch," said Paco, heading Rocinante-from-Detroit toward the railway station, where there is a "fonda" for the hungry. But we laid a detaining hand on his arm.

"First, Paco," we said reprovingly, "we must deliver that bundle at Pancho's bar."

"Oh, of course," agreed Paco, shamefacedly. And so we motored about Alcázar de San Juan a while, making inquiries for Pancho's bar. Finally, we found it, and Paco entered it, bearing the bundle that had been so confidingly entrusted to him, and the individual (described as being on hand awaiting it) was unearthed and thanked all of us profusely. Then, and only then, did we go about our own affairs.

At Alcázar the spell of Don Quixote worked deeply upon us and we were loath to leave La Mancha without drinking in more of Quixotic atmosphere. We held a council. Should we go to Argamasilla de Alba, a town which is as convinced that one of its flesh-and-blood hidalgos was the original of Don Quixote as Alcázar is convinced that, in one of its sombre dwellings, Miguel de Cervantes first saw the light? Should we venture to the lagoons of Ruidera, or to the cave of Montesinos, at both of which the Knight of the Rueful Countenance encountered hair-raising adventures? But—again the deadening influence of this craven day of ours—a glance at the map made Argamasilla and Ruidera and Montesinos seem very far away. Besides, we had come over a very bumpy road before lunch, a road that had not been repaired, seemingly, since Don Quixote and Sancho rode over it, and—well, it behooved us to head northward if Madrid was to be regained that same day. So the upshot of the council was that we were to visit Puerto Lápiche and then turn Rocinante-from-Detroit toward Madrid.



An Inn of La Mancha, Hardly Changed Since Don Quixote's Time.

Photograph From J. Belda.

Puerto Lápiche! Surely, every lover of "Don Quixote" will know what that name connotes. He will remember that it was at the roadside inn of Puerto Lápiche that the adventurous madman of La Mancha, having suddenly remembered, to his horror, that he had never been dubbed a knight according to the ritual of chivalry, decided to get himself so dubbed without delay. To him the humble inn was a castle, the innkeeper a noble lord of the manor, grimy folk chewing and guzzling on the premises blue-blooded relatives and faithful retainers. So Don Quixote, alighting from Rocinante before the inn of Puerto Lápiche, proceeded to pile his armor upon the well in the inn-yard and hold moonlight vigil over it, according to the rules of knight-errantry. And when a carrier, wishing to water his horses, started to remove the armor from the top of the well, Don Quixote laid that carrier's head open with a blow of his spear, and there was such a deuce of a row that the innkeeper, fearing that the inn would be wrecked if his belligerent guest continued his antics, forthwith "knighted" him, aided by two wandering wenches, known, respectively, as La Tolosa and La Molinera.

TO Don Quixote, however, they were gracious damsels, and he informed them, with the exquisite courtesy that always adorned his madness, that it pleased him to ennoble them and that they were to be known, thenceforth, as Doña Tolosa and Doña Molinera. The wenches opened wide eyes, the innkeeper snickered, the denizens of the inn stood about, gaping in wonder. And Don Quixote was suffered to go upon his way—"without being required to pay his reckoning," says Cervantes.

All this we saw, in imagination, as we halted for a brief moment in the street of the Puerto Lápiche of today, clinging to both sides of the highway between Andalusia and Madrid. Somewhere near by, we knew, were the ruins of a building said, by local tradition, to have been the inn where Don Quixote was knighted. But why seek it? What could a pile of stones do to make any brighter the glorious picture in our minds?

As we sped ever nearer to Madrid, to reality, to relentless today, we seemed to descry the tall, gaunt figure of Castilian knights, enveloped in rusty armor, flanked by a burly peasant on a donkey, seated silently on every hillock, silently eyeing us from the top of every ridge.

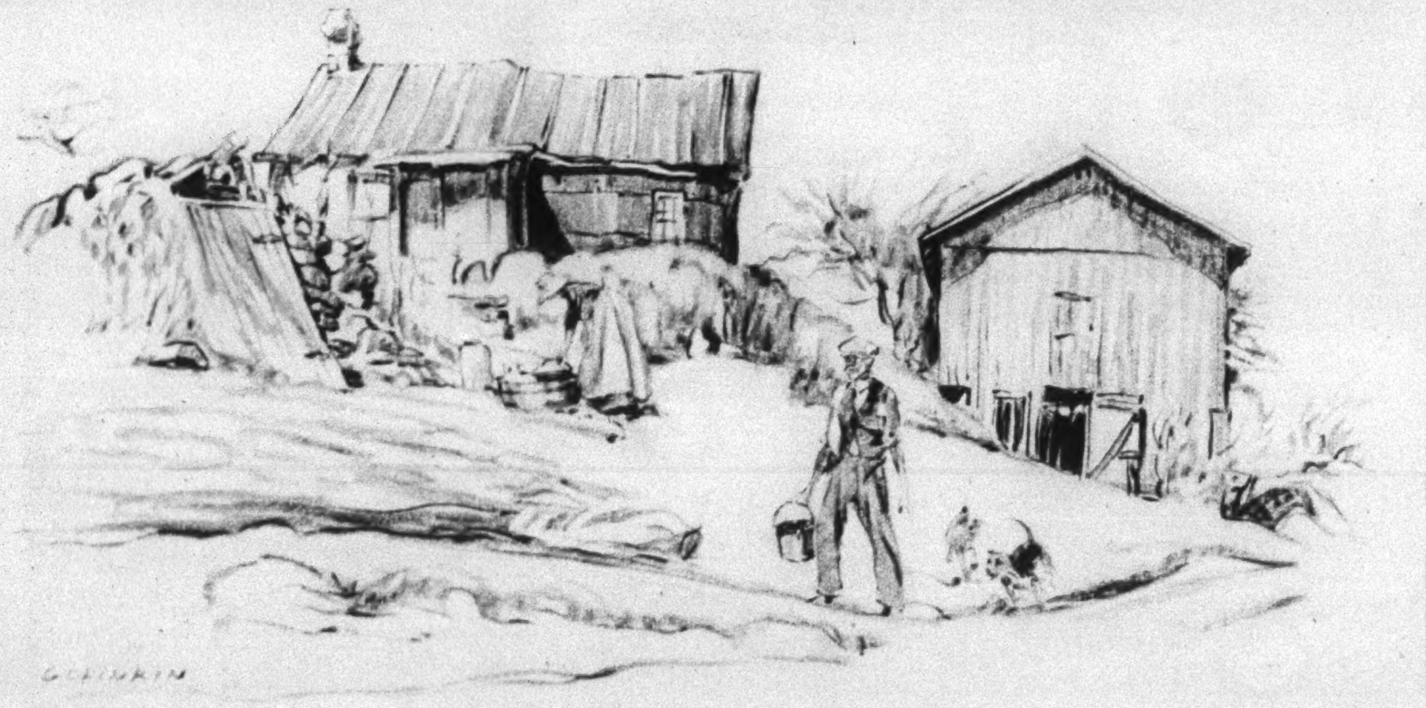
A MOUNTAIN FOLK IN NEW YORK'S SHADOW

People of the Hudson Highlands Forced From Homes by State Park



A Mountain Farm, Just a Mile Off the Highway.

By DIANA RICE

UP Sandyfields way the mountaineers of the Hudson River Highlands, near Bear Mountain, are still singing their hymns. But there is discontent today behind the religious dirges. For the farms their ancestors settled 200 years ago are to pass, not to their children and their children's children, as was formerly the custom, but into alien hands. Ancestral acres are to be utilized to make another lake for a great State park; a park, according to the mountaineers, that already has enough lakes. The mountain folk acknowledge that they will receive cash for those home acres from the Palisades Interstate Park, which needs them for its further development. But what does cash mean to a mountaineer bereft of his mountains, his shotgun and his hound-dog? Mountainfolk who once hunted bear and wolves in forests of the Hudson Highlands sniff at tailor-made trails made safe for democracy.

''And where can I buy another farm with a house like this on it?'' asks the oldest man in the district. The low sagging edifice referred to did not look ''firm as a rock,'' but the owner insists that, despite its 100 years, it is.

Mountaineers stand at the doors of their weatherbeaten houses and point out just how far the waters of the proposed lake will rise when the new dam is finished and the land on which they have lived so many years is covered up. Between 200 and 300 acres will disappear under the big pond now in the making. Beaver Dam, which will hold back the waters of the lake, the fourteenth dam in the park system, is nearly completed, though work on it has been delayed by the protest of mountaineers against giving over the last of their acres for park purposes. Fifty-one parcels of land must change hands before the thirty-two-foot dam can be thrown across the county highway and flood waters turned into pastures lying beyond.

As the settlement closest to the new dam, Sandyfields is the district most deeply concerned. More than three generations have lived in several of the homes to be flooded. The road that is to replace the present county highway will swing further west, joining the Suffern turnpike in the general vicinity of Johnsontown, another century-old settlement.

A few of the farmers have already sold out to the Park Commissioners and trekked off to new country. More than fifty families, however—about 300 people—have been carrying on the fight, which culminated recently in a mass meeting at Isaiah Jones's general store in Sandyfields. Mountaineers in overalls and heavy boots came to this meeting one night and told their side of the story to the lawyers of the park board. Sharp words, it is said, passed between the opposing factions. Bad feeling flamed into bitter denunciation of high-handed methods.

But the meeting resulted in victory for the Park Commissioners. Homeowners of Sandyfields and Johnsontown, protesting against the condemnation of more than 1,000 acres of land, lost their case. The New York State law gives the Palisades Interstate Park Commission power of eminent domain in the acquisition of property for park purposes. Thus farms, ponds, creeks and hunting grounds adjoining Bear Mountain will be taken and the hamlets of Sandyfields and Johnsontown, which have stood still for 150 years, will within a few months be no more.

SANDYFIELDS is today the centre of the mountaineers' country. Five miles or so west of Stony Point, which lies along the Hudson River not far from Haverstraw, the settlement boasts but a handful of houses. A general store, a little schoolhouse and a Methodist church are its gathering points. There is no postoffice. Mail comes by rural free delivery from Stony Point; packages by parcel post. The mountaineer is an ardent reader of catalogues, and his perusal of these thick volumes often results in heavy work for the mailman. Two hundred dollars in one day have been known to leave the mountain en route to mail order houses of the Middle West.

Womenfolk of the highlands do not waste time shopping. Few of them ever leave their homes. They order their ginghams, cotton stockings and heavy shoes, direct from the great emporiums whose advertisements read like fairytales. If the old folks cannot read, the young ones can. For even in the mountains life is growing more complex as sons and daughters journey out to the strange world beyond the rim of hills and bring back stories of different standards of living.

One must leave the main highway that leads on to Sloatsburg and Suffern, if one would find the real mountaineer. His habitat is either hidden in a clump of trees or stands free and open to all kinds of weather on the mountainous hills known as the Hudson Highlands. Roads leading to these farm clearings are not so good. Stones and stumps, bog bottoms and unexpected holes make them precarious for automobiles.

A journey to a mountaineer's cabin does not always end in a warm welcome. Mountainfolk in general, and these in particular, are a shy people. The kitchen door may stand invitingly open; the screen door be unlatched, but repeated knocks bring no response. Somewhere in the house a faint rustle bespeaks human occupancy, and occasionally a long wait is rewarded by a glimpse of the inmates. But usually as the disappointed visitor, leaving reluctantly, looks back, she sees the tightly-drawn front-room shade quiver almost imperceptibly. And that is all. Perhaps it is the ghost of a long dead mountaineer hiding in a parlor opened only for funerals and weddings. Perhaps not.

The backyard of such a farmhouse is friendlier. There a tame cat purring in the sun rises to rub its fur against a visitor's dress, a cackling hen runs out from a nest hidden in the bushes, and an old hound-dog, lazily wagging his tail, regards indulgently the stranger from a world that knows nothing of hunting.

The oldest house in the district, a log cabin with 150 years behind it, stands on one of these hidden eminences, its terrace facing a beautiful, broad expanse of country sweeping off to distant highlands. Crumbling and disheveled, patched with building paper and shingles, the hovel is still waterproof and livable. Its owner has built another house close by, large enough to hold the many children and grandchildren that all good mountaineers appear to have. But the little log house with its end chimney and two rooms provide for an overflow when kinsfolk turn up unexpectedly to spend a day or a years — as kinsfolk have a way of doing in the country.

THERE is an unexpected modern touch in gay chintz curtains shading windows that look on a farmyard which is the last word in neglect. Everything from a three-wheeled buggy to a broken cookstove litters the half-acre that stretches between log cabin and bigger houses. In a clearing, a small vegetable garden struggles with growing pains. Below the log cabin's hill there is a huckleberry swamp, which brings in money when berries are plentiful. Then all hands round the place turn in and pick each day from dawn to dusk as long as the berries last.

''Old man R. still makes his children work for him,'' says a neighbor. ''When huckleberry picking time comes around, he sends for 'em all to come home. Don't pay 'em much. But they pick for him just the same.''

While the shy family is more often seen in the remoter parts of

An Archaeological Map of the World Showing the Many Areas in Which Man Is Seeking Light on His History.

WHERE MAN DIGS TO READ HIS ANCIENT STORY

Far-Flung Is the Empire of the Archaeologist, Who, at Work in Many Parts of The World, Seeks to Bring Up Secrets That Have Long Been Buried

By CLARK WISSLER,

Curator of Anthropology, American Museum of Natural History

AN American archaeologist digging in a ruin beside a national highway in a Western State was so beset by inquisitive tourists that he sarcastically remarked, "All America seems obsessed by a gopher complex." Certainly every one seems to feel the urge to dig. But a real archaeologist is one who goes about the business in a scientific manner, who sets himself the problem of finding out what manner of life once flourished at the spot chosen for digging and then of proceeding so as to read in the earth and the objects uncovered the story of the past.

Many such scientific archaeologists are now either hard at work or setting out for new diggings. The peak of the exodus comes early in Summer, not so much because this is the season when the climate is the most favorable—for often it is not—but because many of the investigators are college professors or curators in museums, turning to the out-of-doors not merely to take a vacation but to renew their intellectual youth in the study of new things. It is also the best time for the student, the archaeologist of the future, to get his professional training. Some kind of interneship he must have, if he is to do his part.

It is the custom to say that on such an occasion one leads an "expedition." This is a high-sounding term, and to the uninitiated calls up visions of a great party, moving with pack trains, &c., and such is sometimes the case. But usually the archaeologist sets out alone to be joined at the chosen site by one and rarely more than two scientific assistants. Once he is on the ground, local labor and assistance will be recruited as may be required. Some of the "expeditions" now operating in the ancient burial sites of Asia Minor employ more than 200 laborers, but usually the number is small. Speed and mass production are of no avail in the work of the archaeologist; even an ordinary shovel may be too much, for his best results come as he kneels in his trench, working with a penknife and a small paint brush. Some of his important finds are often so frail and so obscure that with a less experienced eye and cruder tools they would pass into the dump unnoticed and be lost forever. Imagine how a surgeon would feel seeing some one about to perform an amputation with a cross-cut saw! That is just the state an archaeologist is in when he sees a carefree would-be archaeologist at work.

FIRST let us see where these seekers for buried treasure and facts go. To what parts of the earth's surface do they turn? In our day man seems to have overrun most of the earth, so any place with a reasonable climate might be worth digging into. But though there are some fourteen regions in which archaeological work is or will soon be under way, these are by no means scattered over the world at random. About two-thirds of them are grouped around the Mediterranean Sea; the other third around Middle America. This can at least mean one thing—that the centres of interest for archaelogists lie in two areas. It does not mean that the rest of the world has no archaeology. In every State in our country some work is carried on, and also in every country of the civilized world. But such investigations are incidental and often the work of local enthusiasts rather than of specialists. Almost without exception the outstanding archaeologists of the world are to be found in the localities mentioned. The dominant interest seems to be in Egypt, Asia Minor, Greece and Italy.

If one asks the why of this, the answer is not far to seek. The origins of Western civilization lie in Egypt, Palestine, Babylonia and Assyria, Greece and Italy. These were the successive cradle-lands of our cherished ideals. It is because the background to present-day life lies buried in these lands that archaeologists flock there. Our religion has more to do with it than is usually supposed. In all Christian countries such names as Egyptians, Babylonians, Greeks and Romans are familiar to all, and it is not so long ago that the only ancient history acquired by half our population came from the Bible.

Perhaps this is why there still lingers in our minds the notion that the height of luxury, glory and riches was reached in the time of Solomon and the Queen of Sheba. How unreal and distorted such notions are the archaeologist well knows, but we still like to believe them. This is why we were thrilled when the press of the land told us of the work of archaeologists in the ruins of ancient Ur, where the tomb of a queen was found intact. When buried the body of this queen—Shub-Ab, she is named—was wrapped in a richly ornamented cloak, while an elaborate headdress of gold and wonderful jewelry embellished all. In addition a harp, suits of armor, chariots and other unusual objects were recovered. Probably no one would wear this jewelry now because it is inferior in fabrication and design to our own, but we picture it as far superior and above all as objective proof that the myths of romance and riches concerning ancient cities are realities. Most of us feel a deep satisfaction in that the foundations of Solomon's Temple have been uncovered and that their appearance agrees with biblical description. The recent finding of Sodom and Gomorrah and the evidence that it was destroyed in the Bronze Age and never rebuilt is a case in point. And if the tomb of Abraham should be found, as some archaeologists predict, that event will move the whole Christian world.

ON the other hand, the archaeologist is a serious-minded person; he discounts myths, for his object is to find what is the truth respecting our ancestors and what have been the steps by which man has attained civilization. We are still mystified as to how the ancients achieved what they did.

This season a number of American institutions will return to their diggings. At Ur, the archaeologist in charge is Dr. C. L. Woolley, supported jointly by the British Museum and the University of Pennsylvania. The University of Pennsylvania, by the way, has long been interested in archaeology and has worked almost continuously in the Near East for fifty years. Further, it may be interesting to note that an American and a British institution are cooperating at Ur, but this is not altogether unique because the Field Museum of Chicago maintains a similar arrangement with the University of Oxford in excavations at Kish, and Yale University with the British School of Archaeology in Palestine. The Metropolitan Museum of Art continues its work in Egypt.

OTHER American institutions known to be supporting expeditions during the current year are the Universitites of Yale, Harvard, Princeton, Chicago and Johns Hopkins; Haverford College, Xenia Theological Seminary, and a number of similar institutions are also in the field. Last season from America and Europe some forty-five expeditions were out, distributed as follows: Egypt, 3; Mesopotamia, 4; Persia, 1; Palestine, 15; Greece, 10; Italy, 9; Turkey, 3.

It is thus clear that archaeology in countries bordering the Mediterranean is in the nature of a going concern, supporting a personnel of large size, involving large expeditions and the employment of many hundred laborers. The classics and ancient history are still popular subjects among university students, most of whom must be content with what they read from books and see in our growing museum collections. But for the few who specialize in such subjects, these expeditions to dig up buried temples and cities give ample opportunity to acquire first-hand knowledge and experience.

Yet the record for Europe would not be complete without taking note of the search for the man of the Stone Age. In France the haunts of the cave man are still sought out. From Yale, the well-known authority, George Grant MacCurdy, will lead a party of students for practical work in excavating among certain French sites. From the University of Pennsylvania a party headed by Vladimir J. Fewkes will search for Neolithic man in the valley of the Danube. In England, Germany, Russia, Switzerland, Spain, Italy and the Scandinavian countries local archaeologists will carefully dig for the remains and works of early man. It is indeed a small well-organized army that goes forth every season to wrest from the bosom of Mother Earth the secrets of the past. Each year marks a gain, some new fact, some new insight into the evolution of human culture. We begin to see how and where art, industry and religion began and feel as did that great philosopher, William James, when learning what the archaeologist had to say of the cave man: "Bone of our bone, flesh of our flesh were those brutish ancestors of ours."

So far we have said nothing of India. There are not wanting signs that that country is rich in archaeological materials and due to reveal many surprising and revolutionary facts, but until recent years little attention was given to the subject. Now, however, under British auspices and through native scholarship remains are brought to light which definitely connect ancient India with Babylonia.

Interest is also growing in the archaeology of China. Our readers are familiar with the triumphs of the Asiatic expedition sent out by the American Museum of Natural History under the leadership of Roy Chapman Andrews and the traces of early man they have brought to light. Added to this is a growing interest upon the part of the younger generation in China in the prehistory of their own civilization, resulting in the excavation of several important sites. Unfortunately, unsettled political conditions and strong anti-foreign sentiment are discouraging American and European support to archaeological work in China and so long as these conditions continue little progress is to be expected.

NATIONAL pride demands that we take note of the New World. No such glamour emanates from our antiquities as from bibical and classical lands. The classical scholar who feels that the only true culture came from the Old World puts little value upon the pagan civilizations of Middle America; for him they have nothing to contribute and are therefore no source of inspiration. Nevertheless, our public is interested and it is still a fair question as to how long the ancient civilizations of America can be ignored, as a part of the world's history. The triumphs of archaeologists in the Old World have not been in that they discovered wonderful museum specimens, but in that they could extend history; that even when writing was unknown they could give reliable relative dates to their finds and thus reconstruct history.

The knowledge that in Europe the Stone Age preceded that of Bronze is just as much a fact of history as that Henry Hudson saw Manhattan in 1609. The only difference is that we have a calendar date for the one and a relative date for the other, for we know the time relations between these two events. However this may be, it remains that those who choose American archaeology are neither urged by Christian motives nor by the need for a better understanding of their own civilization. They are first of all merely curious about what went on here before the white man came upon the scene. Our forefathers were puzzled because what they observed was not consistent with the Bible, in which no mention is made of these ancient New World cities or of the people who must have built them. They seemed to have no place in Old World history, but that they did have such a place some were confident and so sought all that could be learned about them.

THOSE less intellectually alert dismissed the subject by regarding the mounds in the Mississippi Valley and the temples of Mexico as the work of the devil, an effort on his part to undermine and belittle faith in God. It was upon this assumption that many records of Central American civilization were destroyed by Spanish rulers. But in the Colonies and later in the United States the problem was regarded as one for history and science, the investigation of which has been championed by many leaders of thought from Jefferson down. One of the conspicuous aspects of this inquiring attitude has been the interest shown by the States and the National Government and their willingness to support this impractical and in some ways non-Christian research. Many years ago there was established in Washington a governmental bureau for such study which has continued to the present, the staff of which devotes its whole time to research and whose publications are known throughout the world. Then the great museums of America—the National Museum in Washington, the American Museum of Natural History and the Museum of the American Indian, Heye Foundation, in New York; the Peabody Museum of Harvard, the University of Pennsylvania Museum, the Field Museum of Chicago, &c.—have for many years maintained strong departments in the archaeology of the New World.

THIS year many expeditions will be out. Taking them up in order, the State museums of Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, Wisconsin, Kentucky, &c., are actively engaged with the mound builder problem. Ohio still occupies the centre of the stage. For twenty or more years under the leadership of the late W. C. Mills expeditions have been undertaken each Summer, the results of which have been housed in the State museum at Columbus. It is now known that the metropolis of the great mound building period—the period known to archaelogists as the Hopewell Culture—was near what is now Chillicothe, Ohio. This period was not only characterized by gigantic and complex earthworks but by an unusual development in the carving of small stone images and the working of copper plates.

However, by far the greatest number of American archaeologists will gather in the Western States of New Mexico and Arizona, or, as they call it, the Southwest. This is the land of the cliff dwellers. Every important museum and research institution in the United States supporting archaeology will have a representative in this area this season. The investigators are so numerous and so specialized that each year they hold a conference at Santa Fé, at which time the results for the season are discussed and plans formed for the future. Last Summer some sixty specialists were in attendance, a gathering which has come to be recognized as one of the most important events in American archaeology. It is but fair to add that its inception and success are due to the personality and ability of A. V. Kidder of the Carnegie Institution of Washington, the leading authority on the archaeology of the region. It was also due to the progress thus made that John D. Rockefeller Jr. gave funds for the establishment of an archaeological laboratory at Santa Fé, N. M.

Mexico and the Maya area, lands of ruined and mysterious temples, will receive due attention, though Winter is the most favorable time. First of all, the Mexican Government maintains a staff of archaeologists and spends a relatively large sum of money in the work. Many of the most important ruins in its territory are partially restored and protected by watchmen, while in Mexican museums may be seen collections from the same. The leading American institution in this field is the Carnegie Institution of Washington, whose work was recently brought to notice by explorations from the air by Colonel Lindbergh. There are still many unsolved problems in this part of the New World and many important discoveries awaiting the archaeologist. Each season reveals new wonders of these lost civilizations, whose artistic accomplishment and practical achievement astonish us.

FINALLY, there is the fascinating story of the Inca in Peru, not to mention other extinct South American civilizations. For many years the governments of Peru and Ecuador have supported archaelogical research within their own boundaries. The bulk of their present populations is directly descended from the builders of these ruins and still possesses some of the cultural heritage associated therewith. Among the local investigators who will be at work this season are the well known Max Uhle in Ecuador and Julio Tello in Peru. The latter is not only a great archaelogist but a professor in the university at Lima, and a direct descendant of Inca stock. From Peru not only comes fine work in gold and pottery, but most renowned of all, textiles of unique quality, examples of which may be seen in our large museums.

All these expeditions go out for two purposes: first to bring back

Is your powder apparent or transparent ?

Now that the approval of a natural style of make-up is so wide-spread, an apparent powder . . . one which cakes and flakes and gives the user the appearance of wearing a mask . . . is as out of date as an abbreviated hem-line. Poudre le Début, Hudnut's triumphant new success, owes a great part of its approval among smart women to the delicacy of its texture . . . as suave as silk, as light as gossamer, and so transparent that your natural skin tones glow through . . . softly . . . like color seen through mist. You'll like the gentle tenacity with which it clings . . . long, long after ordinary powders would vanish. You'll like the fragrance as delicate as its texture. You'll like one of the eight shades, each as smartly styled as the gay, modern box. At the better shops.

RICHARD HUDNUT · Parfumeur · New York Paris

The method and the powder

POUDRE
Le Début

Even a fine powder can lose much of its charm by incompetent powdering. Pat Poudre le Début . . . quantities of it . . . lightly all over your face and throat. Let it rest a few minutes before removing it with a soft brush. Be sure to stroke any remaining particles from lashes and brow. The result . . . a soft, velvety, subtle bloom . . . beautifying, alluring.

LONDON'S FAMOUS SAVOY HOTEL
pays Americans this gracious compliment

On the site of the ancient Palace of Savoy rises the imposing facade of the modern Savoy Hotel. There—in the heart of old London—it commands the broad sweep of the River Thames from Westminster Abbey to the Tower.

AMONG the many luxurious amenities which are offered to American guests at the smart and fashionable Savoy Hotel in London, there are probably few more appreciated than the fact that Beech-Nut Coffee figures amongst the various kinds of coffee that the Savoy's cafetier prepares. In the brilliant restaurant which, more than any other in Europe, is famous for its exquisite cuisine and perfect wines, it is not surprising to find the one coffee which so many Americans consider to be the best coffee in the world. It is the same in every famous restaurant.... you find that where an hotel or restaurant has become the resort of a smart and discriminating clientele, it is largely due to the careful and clever attention to the smaller detail — the small unobtrusive delicacy — whether it be in cuisine, apartments or service, which is essential to luxurious living.

EXTRACT FROM LETTER TO THE BEECH-NUT PACKING CO. FROM THE MANAGEMENT OF THE SAVOY HOTEL:

"It may interest you to know that we have now decided to supply American Coffee to those of our guests who prefer it and that after sampling many brands we have decided that Beech-Nut is the best American Coffee obtainable, and we intend to stock it in the future for our American guests."

A. Gilles, General Manager

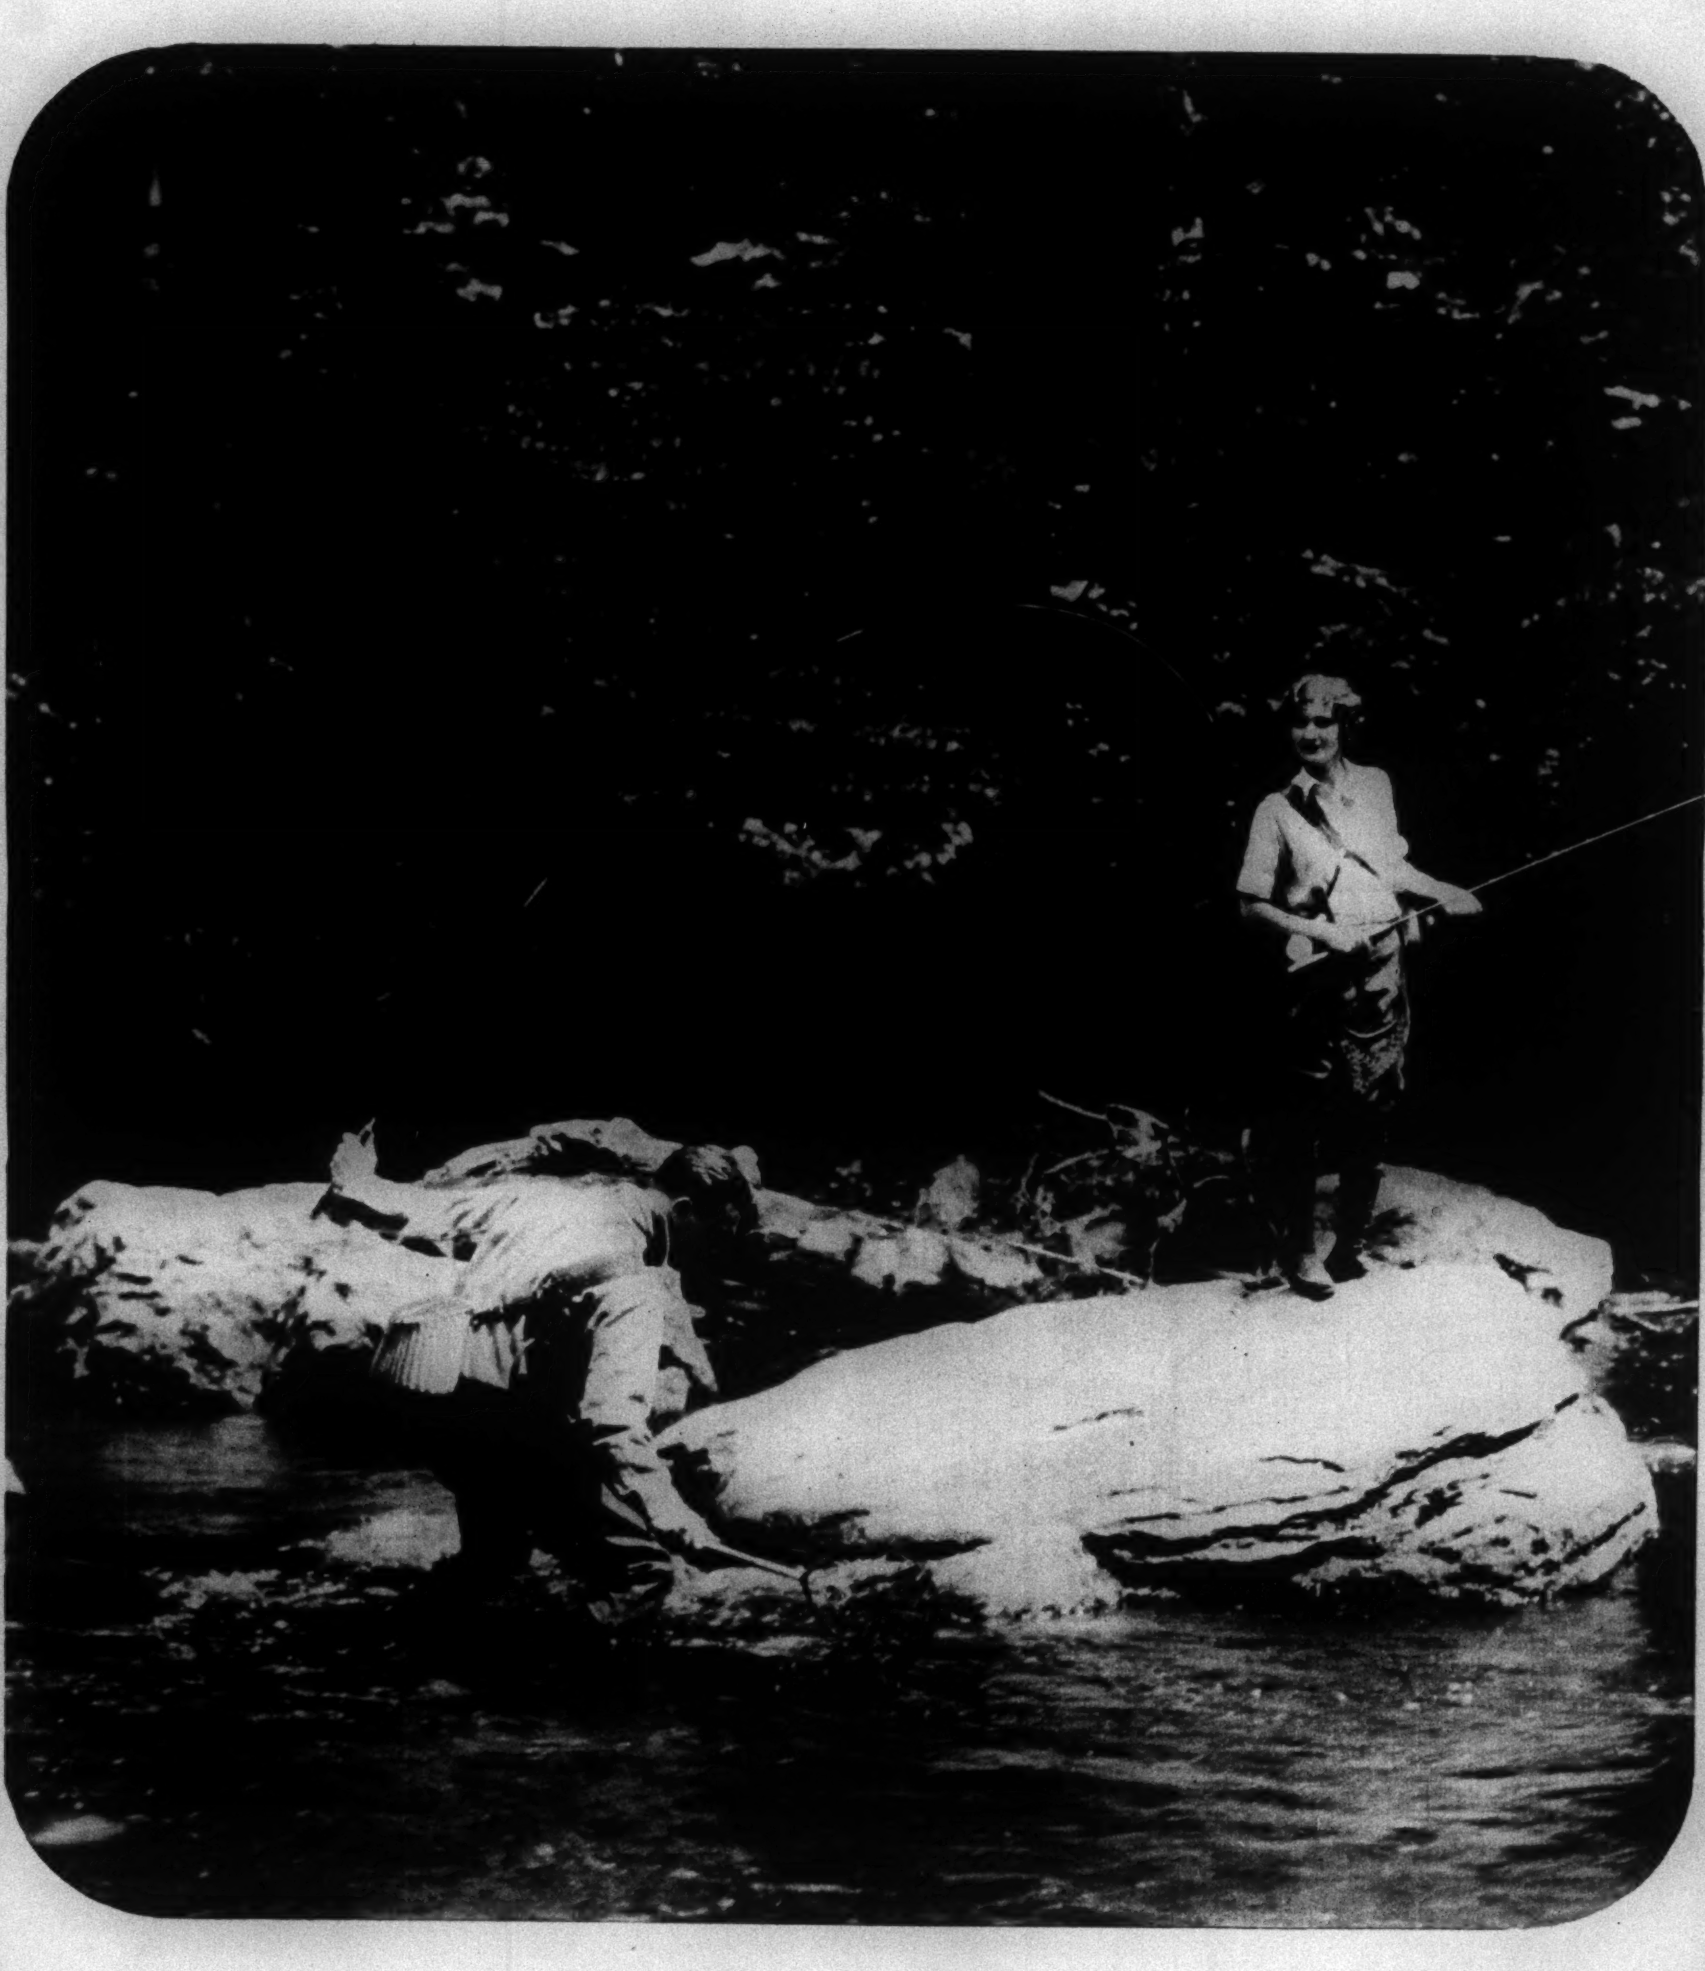
The Zip and Sing of a Taut Line . . .
The Sparkle and Coolness of a Clear Stream



THE rushing water is shadow-flecked . . . the wind stirs the leaves of the trees, the only sound. Poised he waits, and then the high, thin click of the reel as he casts. Here is a sportsman, finding vigor and exhilaration in the great outdoors.

Do you wonder that he, and countless others like him, drink "Canada Dry," the sportsman's beverage? For in the sparkling, cool, clear depths of this fine old ginger ale he finds the vigor and exhilaration of sport itself.

In "Canada Dry" sportsmen recognize a matching quality of excellence

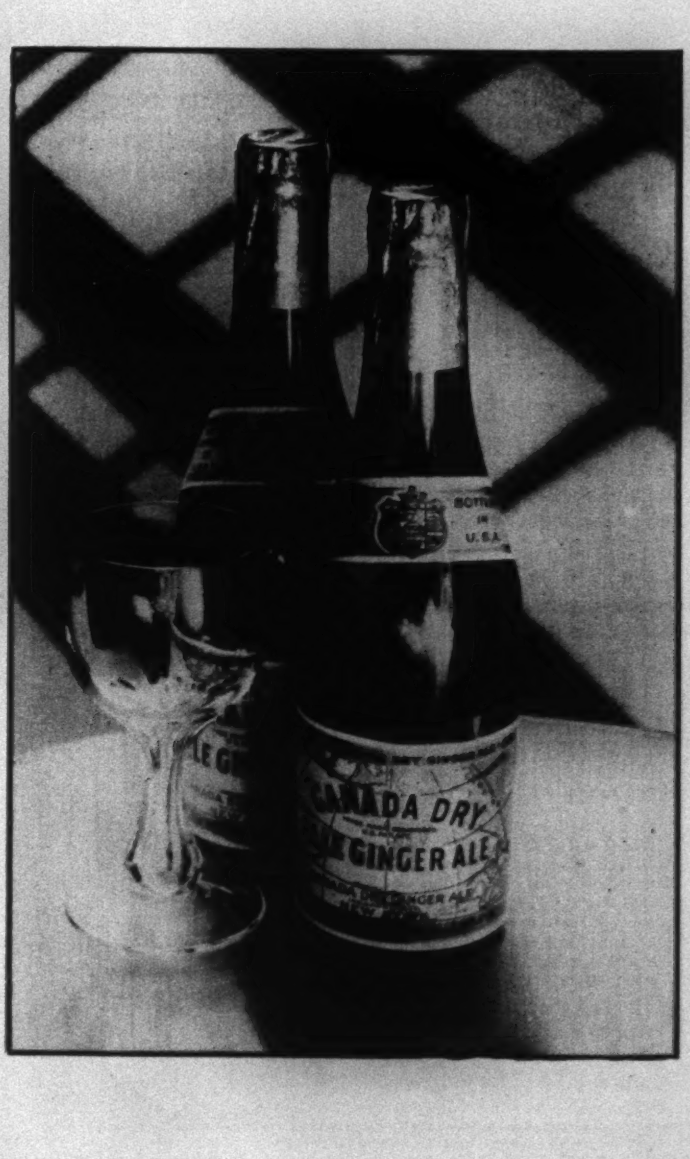
You, too, are a sportsman. You thrill to the zest of the game well played. And you value excellence above all qualities. Then you probably drink "Canada Dry." For, like sportsmen, it has basic excellence.

The very foundation of "Canada Dry" is "Liquid Ginger"—which we make from selected Jamaica ginger root by a special process. This process is exclusively controlled by us and, unlike any other method, retains for "Canada Dry" all of the original aroma, flavor and natural essence of the ginger root. Rigid laboratory control assures uniformity, purity and highest quality. A special process of carbonation enables "Canada Dry" to retain its sparkle long after the bottle has been opened.

The distinction of this ginger ale is famous the world over

Such exclusive methods produce a ginger ale of matchless flavor. No wonder it has won world-wide acclaim! In famous New York clubs . . . in the Houses of Parliament at Ottawa . . . in the great hotels of London and Paris . . . on transatlantic liners "Canada Dry" is the choice of many, many people.

And in countless homes throughout this country this inimitable beverage adds its distinction and zest to dining. The Hostess Package of 12 bottles is a convenient way always to have "Canada Dry" on hand.



HAVE YOU TRIED—?

Canada Dry's new Golden Ginger Ale. Never before have you tasted a golden ginger ale with such a marvelous flavor. The secret of its delight comes from a secret and exclusive process of beverage making. Buy it where you buy "Canada Dry."

Canada Dry's new Sparkling Lime. This wonderfully refreshing beverage brings you the lure and romance of the tropics. Let it win you with its keen, cooling lime taste as it is winning countless others daily. Buy it where you buy "Canada Dry."

ONE PREMIERE AS BROADWAY AWAITS THE NEW SEASON

What News On the Rialto?

AFTER a spell of Summer inactivity, the Brady office became busy almost overnight last week when Mr. Brady, in association with John Tuerk, purchased a play by Marya Mannes, wife of Jo Mielziner, of the settings, and decided to give it an immediate production. "Café" is the name of the play, José Ruben is directing it, and Rollo Peters will be among those in the cast.

Mr. Woods will probably be interested in this production, and Mr. Brady, in turn, will be associated with Mr. Woods in presenting Louis Weitzenkorn's newspaper play, "Five Star Final," which likewise will be done immediately. Mr. Weitzenkorn is on his way over from Paris to arrange the details.

Mr. Brady has also been discussing a play with Edward Sheldon, and that looms as more than a possibility on his schedule. While he does not intend to become conspicuously active as a producer, Mr. Brady does hope to be able to keep his Playhouse as profitably occupied as it has been in recent months.

Among other shows about to go in rehearsal in this town is "The Up and Up," the underworld comedy by Martha Madison and Eva Kay Flint. Work on it will begin in another week under the direction of Howard Lindsay, and it will open at the Broad Street Theatre, Philadelphia, on Aug. 25 for a two weeks' engagement before coming to New York. The cast of twenty-four will include Dorothy Stickney, the dossier of whose excellent performances includes the underworld drab in "The Front Page." Donald MacDonald, Pat O'Brien, William Foran and Henry Sherwood, the last two of whom may still be remembered for their contributions to "Broadway."

After launching this play its producers, E. A. Blatt and M. J. Nicholas, will turn their attention to the revue announced by Mr. Blatt some time ago as "The New Yorker." (Just to make matters needlessly confusing these hot days, E. Ray Goetz is planning another musical show to be called "The New Yorkers," but that virtual duplication of titles will doubtless be straightened out in due time.) Anyway, the Nicholas-Blatt enterprise will contain music by Muriel Pollock, dances arranged by Harold Hecht and sketches by Rian James, who labors in the fertile fields of Brooklyn journalism.

These producers also have a third production for the new season. It is a play by David Leibowitz, and it is described by Mr. Blatt as "an American tragedy."

The Theatre Guild is seriously considering a play by Dawn Powell, who has come into attention with a novel or two. The name of the play is "The Party," and it is described as a "hard-boiled comedy dealing with the advertising business." . . . Mention of the Guild brings up the fact that Theresa Helburn, its executive director, will return from abroad about Aug. 5. She is bringing three plays with her.

Over at the Woods office they are still continuing their search for leading players for Mr. Stallings's dramatization of "A Farewell to Arms," and recently the names of Edna Best and Herbert Marshall came into the discussion as two who would be ideal. Miss Best and Mr. Marshall—or Mr. and Mrs. Marshall, if you will—are at present appearing in the London production of "The Swan," but they seem interested in the prospect of another American visit. Last week efforts were being made to locate Gilbert Miller at Carlsbad in order to find out about the prospective length of "The Swan's" engagement. If there is a chance that Miss Best and Mr. Marshall will be free to come here at a reasonably early date, Mr. Woods will gladly defer preparations for the Stallings-Hemingway play.

Jed Harris has disappeared into the wilds of Maine for a week or so and affairs in his office consequently are more or less at a standstill. It now seems likely that his first undertaking will, after all, be "Mr. Gilhooley," with "The Inspector General" coming along later. And there were reports last week that the fortnight's return engagement of his "Uncle Vanya" production would be played at the National Theatre.

Whatever happens to the "Vanities" in the courts, Mr. Carroll is going right ahead with the erection of his new theatre on the site of his old—well, fairly old—one. It will seat about 3,000 persons, contain all sorts of innovations, including the presentation of big musical shows at a $3 top, and the contractors have promised that it will be ready to open in April or May. Mr. Carroll is planning a second edition of "Sketch Book" as the inaugural attraction.

Meanwhile, just to keep his hand in the business, he has notions of bringing forth in the Fall an intimate, in manner of speaking, revue, "Personalities." For this he hopes to snare eight or ten well-known players and employ only a small chorus. They draw fine distinctions in the musical show field, and it is Mr. Carroll's idea that "Personalities" shall be "a genuine entertainment without distracting girl divertissements." The "Vanities" series will be maintained to represent the pretentious, costly and elaborate school of production—the adjectives are all from the Carroll people—while "Sketch Book" will continue to typify the merely elaborate and ornate without, you understand, being quite as pretentious as "Vanities."

Brutal is probably the mildest adjective to characterize the telling effects of last week's heat upon the handful of theatres now operating. Nearly all the house managers, however, had more elaborate and picturesque ways of describing the weather. . . . Having launched "Reunion," which ended its tryout engagement in Asbury Park last night, Bela Blau and his associates will soon be turning their various attentions to "Overture, 1920," the posthumous William Bolitho play which Marc Connelly will direct and in which Colin Clive will appear. Mr. Blau, so the tale goes, received some revised portions of the play just two days before its author's tragic death.

Comes the pleasant news that George W. Lederer will soon return to the ranks of musical show producers, in which he was active for so many years. A week from tomorrow he will put in rehearsal an intimate musical comedy based on a German play called "The Phantom Ship," which was tried out several seasons ago by Sam H. Harris and Albert Lewis but never arrived in New York. The libretto will be the work of Mr. Lederer and Harry B. and Robert B. Smith, and the tunes and accompanying words will be the composition of Phil Charig and Richard Meyers. Mr. Lederer says that, in accordance with his old policy, the cast will contain few names of the sort known to the trade as "big."

Under the title of "The Night Owl"—or, just possibly, "S O S"—the show will open in Chicago. It hopes to play there at least four weeks before coming East.

Kenyon Nicholson's play, "Torch Song," in production by Arthur Hopkins, promises to be the principal new show in the seashore tryout places this week. With Joanna Roos heading the cast, "Torch Song" will tarry for a week in Atlantic City and then move on to Asbury Park. The new Madge Kennedy farce, which Long Beach and Great Neck have just seen, will be the week's bill at Asbury Park, while Mr. Belasco's "Dancing Partner" will hold the stage at Brighton.

Michael Mindlin, godfather to the little cinema movement, will, it is reported, place in rehearsal in two weeks or so a play by Robert Wilder which deals with Marcus Garvey. (Another play about Garvey was announced not so long ago, but it seems quietly to have disappeared.) "Empire, Inc.," is the title of the Wilder work, and it will require a cast of more than seventy-five, all but two of whom will be Negroes. The piece, scheduled to open here about Labor Day, is said to be so ambitious scenically that it will not be taken on a preliminary tour.

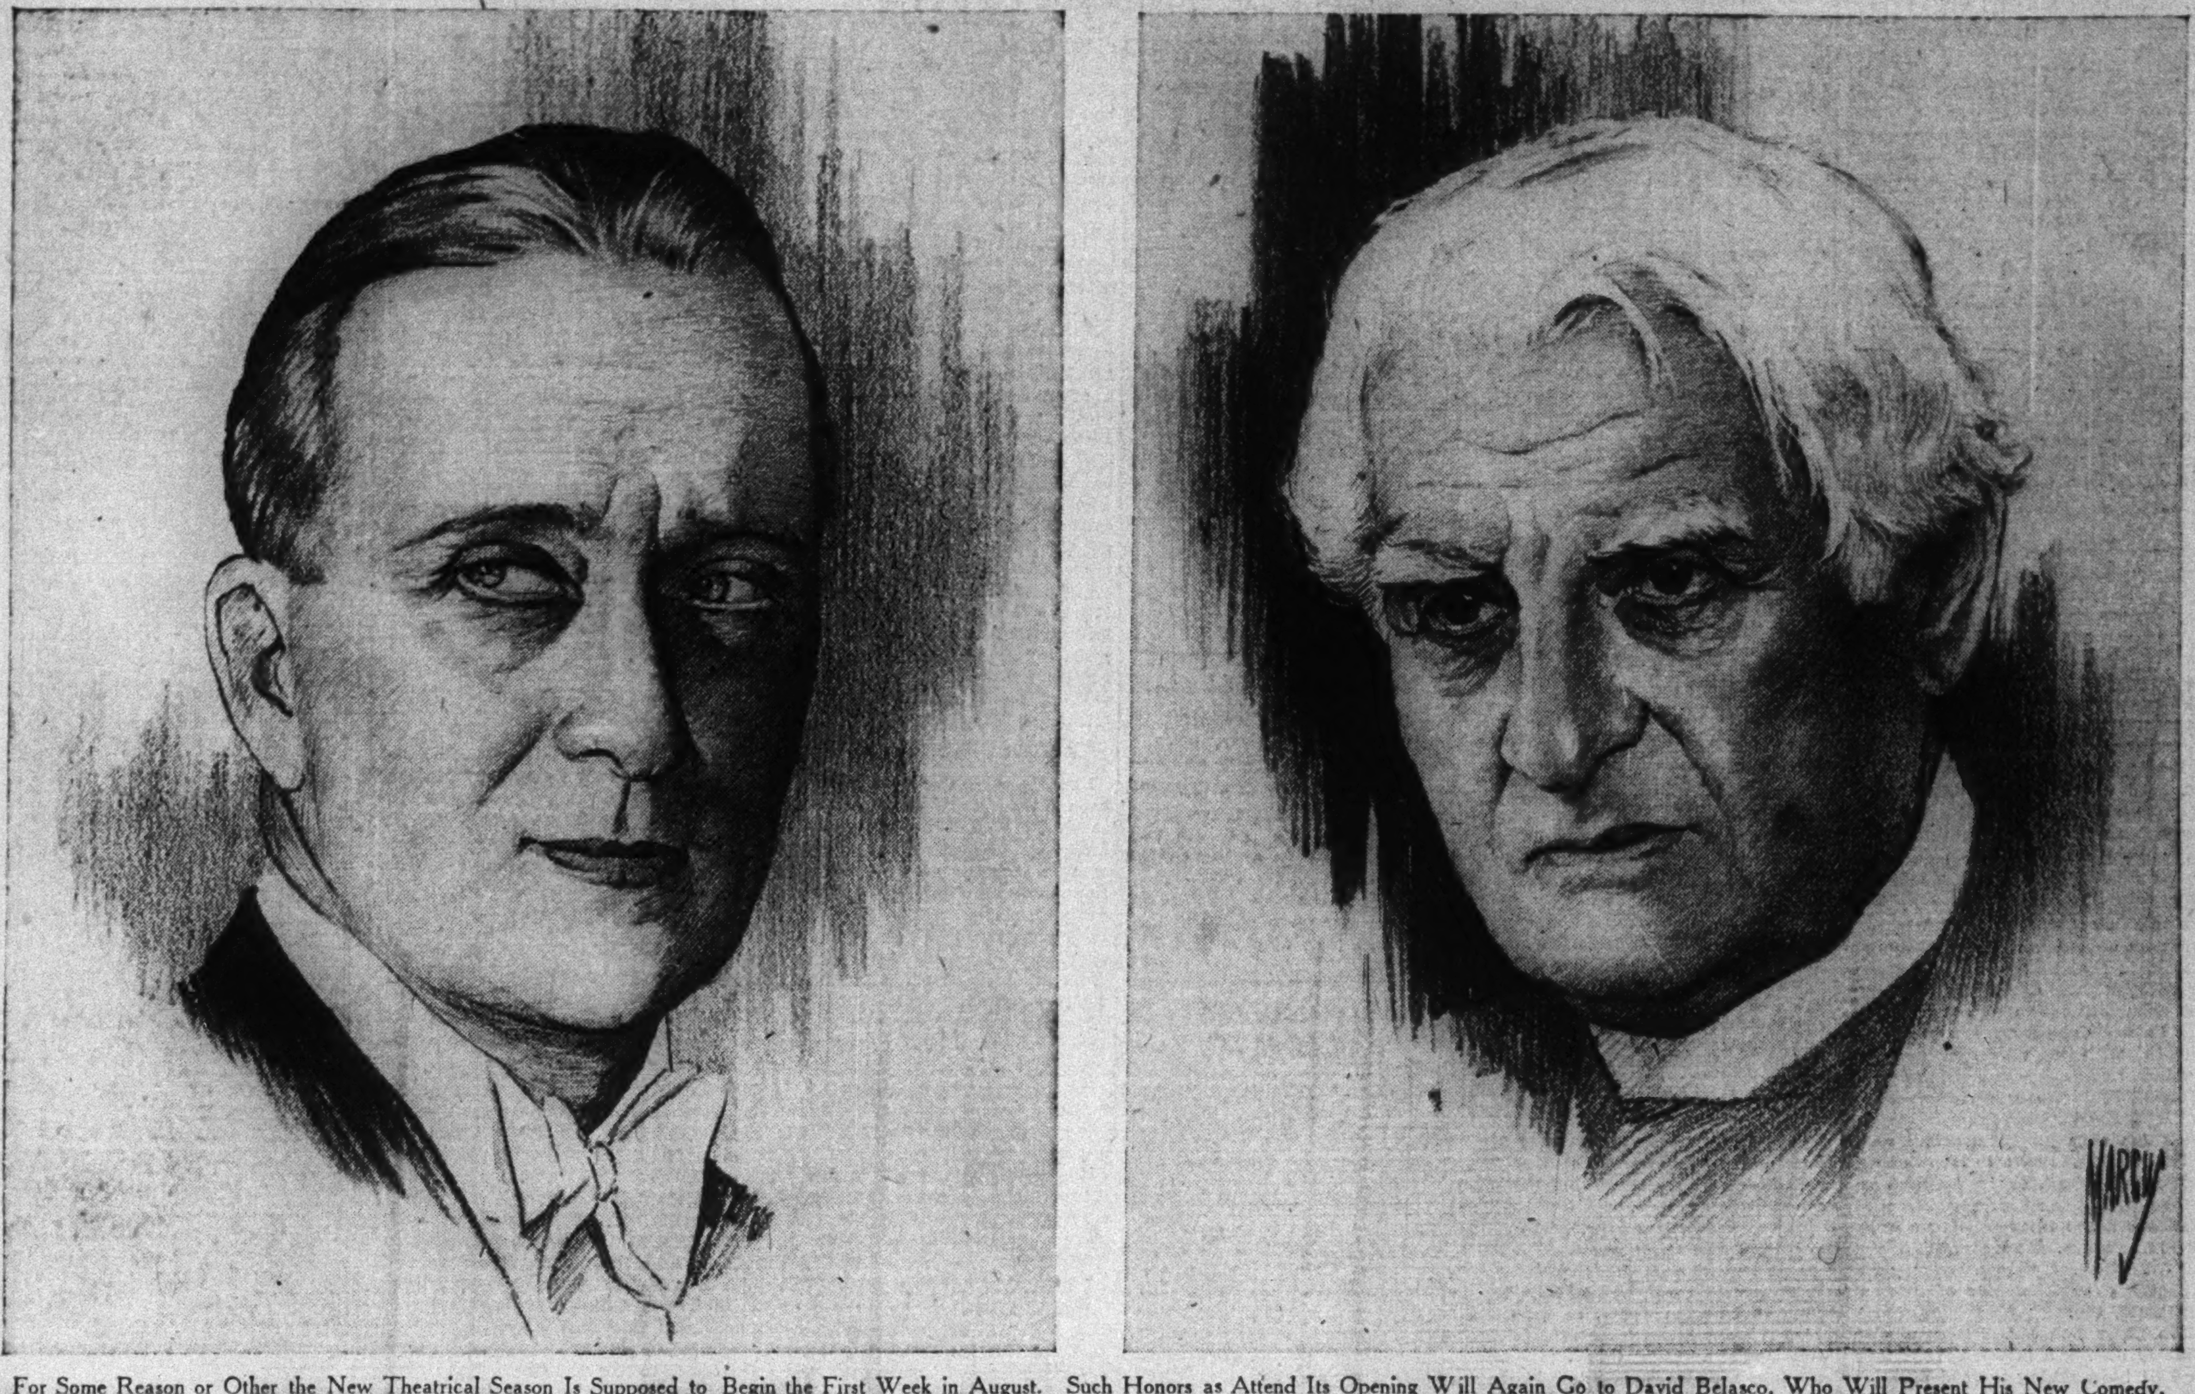
Paul Streger, who produces them from time to time, has acquired a play called "Nice Girl" by Frank Dazey, an author previously heard from and the son of the man who wrote "In Old Kentucky" and others too numerous to name here.

The Gensler-Green musical show for Joe Cook is now scheduled to open at the Colonial Theatre, Boston, around Labor Day and to arrive here in late September. . . . Two young actors who bear names not uncelebrated in the theatre are in the cast of "The Ninth Guest," which the Woods office has in preparation. They are Owen Davis Jr. and Wilton Lackaye Jr. . . . Among the manuscripts in which the Erlanger people are evincing interest these days is the libretto of a musical comedy by Harlan Thompson and Edward Hope.

To hear one returned producer tell it, most of Hollywood is preparing to rush eastward during the coming season and produce shows on Broadway. Which, even if half true, promises a condition somewhat in contrast to the marked theatrical dullness of the past few weeks.

In another fortnight or so Marty Forkins, a showman known in vaudeville, will start preparations upon a Negro musical show which may or may not prove a competitor of Mr. Leslie's forthcoming "Blackbirds." At all events Bill Robinson and Adelaide Hall, who were important in the first "Blackbirds," will be co-starred in the cast of Mr. Forkins's new one.

"Dr. Rex," a play of which the man who wrote "Stepping Sisters"—Howard Warren Comstock the name is—is co-author, will be tried out on Wednesday evening by the group out in Southampton as their third new production of the season. . . Harry D. Kline, general manager for the Chanin interests, is expected home from Europe some time during the coming week.



For Some Reason or Other the New Theatrical Season Is Supposed to Begin the First Week in August. Such Honors as Attend Its Opening Will Again Go to David Belasco, Who Will Present His New Comedy, "Dancing Partner," at His Theatre on Aug. 5. Lynne Overman, Pictured on the Left, Has the Leading Role in the Play. The Other Likeness Is, of Course, of Mr. Belasco, Who, Having Passed His Seventy-sixth Birthday, Now Faces One of the Most Active Periods of His Notable Career.

THE OPENING

LADIES ALL—Tomorrow night at the Morosco Theatre. Credit for breaking the long period of midsummer dullness on Broadway is due the Shuberts, who will here offer the Elmer Harris version of a comedy by Prince Bibesco, which has just completed the rounds of the tryout places. Although Walter Woolf is co-starred with Violet Heming in it, "Ladies All" is, it is expressly stated, not a musical show. Others in the cast are May Collins, Germaine Giroux and Preston Foster.

IN LONDON THE FIRST YEAR SEEMS THE NICEST

By PEGGY WOOD.

Miss Wood celebrated her first anniversary in the London production of "Bitter Sweet" on July 18.

PEOPLE are beginning to say to me, "Aren't you getting homesick for America after being away so long?" and, thinking of it for the first time, I wonder.

Only the other day, walking along Jermyn Street on my way to my matinee, did the sound and smell of London suddenly seem like a foreign city. It was the Saturday before Whitsun, that first popular outdoor holiday week-end of the year; the street was deserted save for a few antique taxis, and all at once it all went queer and ceased to be home; it receded like a fairy-book city, and for the first time in twelve months I felt I was a foreigner walking along a street in a strange town, where no one knew me, and where if I spoke to any one like as not he wouldn't see me. It was probably a throw-back to my first visit to London ten years ago, caused by some smell, or, perhaps, by the very desertion of the street, for I had come to London just at that time of the year and had walked along that way. But whatever it was, the feeling stayed with me until I reached the familiar sights and sounds of the stage door. Up to that moment I had not thought much about being abroad or away from my home.

Enchanting it has certainly been during all these months. More than a year ago I landed to enjoy the most glorious Summer known here in ten years; days and weeks of unending sunshine, with the populace gasping because the thermometer actually read 80 in the shade—think of it! And when Winter came we had only two fogs, baby ones at that. It never snowed and it never froze, so what is all this about the foul English climate? It seems to me I remember the yearly headline at home of "Oh, what is so raw as a day in June?" Perhaps the British weather has kept me from pining as much as I should.

Another thing which keeps me from being too homesick is the steady stream of moans coming from America about the sad, sad state of the drama there. That is matched by the columns here about the sad, sad state of the drama in London, but this morning's paper has notices of the 200th performance of this and the 300th performance of that.

Of course all this calamity-howling doesn't do the theatre here or at home any good, yet years and years of it do not seem to have done any real harm either, for in the "21-years-ago" column of the Day Sketch, which is just that old, I saw the other day that the theatre in London was experiencing a frightful slump, and that even the great drawing power of Lewis Waller had meant nothing in the face of it, for his new play had come off after running only two weeks. I dare say the new excavations in Athens will bring to light some wail about the dying drama in ancient Greece.

The American actress abroad is in a pecular position these days, for she comes in under the handicap of all foreign artists—the prejudice of the local press, which is, after all, duty bound to boost the home talent in times of unemployment and economic pressure. In the first place, it takes a lot of persuading at the Home Office to get a labor permit before the actress is allowed in the country at all, and she must have a contract and that permit in her hand before she can work here. Then she must be prepared to expect the worst from the press as taking the bread out of an English actress's mouth, but she finds as soon as that worst is over that the public feels just the other way about foreign artists and is as delighted with a new face as anybody. Each audience makes her new friends, and in nearly every audience she will find old ones, for when her compatriots come to the play they are always most vociferous in their greeting. They boost with loud cheers the very actress they may not find too amusing at home, either in the joy of seeing some one they recognize or from patriotic reasons or from a desire to let the surrounding Britishers know they knew her when. It is astonishing how many Americans come to London on business during the year. Winter and Summer there is a steady stream of them, and since they can't do much else at night, they go to the theatre.

Now that the height of the London season is on I am beginning to see those faces to which I bade farewell a year ago back again on their annual pilgrimmage, and wonder faintly if they ever went away. Was it a whole year? Or was it only last week? The enchanted theory may not be so foolish as it sounds. Perhaps it was last week. And yet I am certainly a year older and have worked every one of those 365 days, less Sundays. It is all very bewildering.

That isn't quite true about working every one of those days, for in this Protestant country there are no performances on Christmas or Good Friday. Indeed, not only do the actors rest on Christmas but even the buses stop running at 4 in the afternoon and the city is like a tomb. Good Friday it is the same. With this latter day of rest in mind, C. B. Cochran took Mrs. Cochran and me to Paris to see "Bitter Sweet" in French over Easter, so I missed two more performances out of this year's total. I don't need to go into that "Bitter Sweet"-in-French business, do I? Perhaps you will understand why I don't want to when I say that I broke down and wept salt tears at the end, a fact remarked upon in the paper the next day. It stated that Mlle. Wood was so moved by the performance that she was forced to wipe away the tears. So I was, but not for the reasons imagined.

They have another custom in this country of giving matinees on odd days. The rigid rule of Wednesdays and Saturdays which jams up the traffic so in New York doesn't bother them here at all, and to play matinees on Tuesdays and Thursdays, or Tuesdays and Fridays, or any old combination of days goes to make it most interesting for the visiting actresses who like busmen's holidays. Although I must say most of the plays I have wanted to see have had the same matinees as my own, so that I have missed "The Apple Cart," "Michael and Mary," John Gielgud's "Hamlet" and several other enticing things. But I have managed to see a lot of shows which will probably be done in New York next Winter, such as "Nine to Six," the all-woman play; "A Symphony in Two Flats," with and by Ivor Novello; Moissi, the Pitoeffs, the delectable Japanese troupe from Paris, the Cochran Revues, "The Man in Possession," and heard Toscanini conduct America's great orchestra before the King and Queen. It has been an interesting year, and I am not really homesick—yet.

Notes On The Acting Of Comedy

LONDON, July 10.

DURING the last fortnight we have been involved not in the judgment of new or original English plays but in the problems of interpretation of varying shades of comedy. The strange and difficult irony of Ferenc Molnar has been represented in a performance of "The Swan" at the St. James's Theatre; the thin ice of Sacha Guitry in an adaptation of "Désiré," by John Leslie Frith, and the contrasted styles of Oscar Wilde by two revivals, first of "Lady Windermere's Fan" and the second of "The Importance of Being Earnest."

"The Swan" is already well known to you in New York. In England we have to face and explain the fact that nothing of Molnar's has hitherto enjoyed in London the success expected for it. Is the fault our own or is there something in his method of writing that is inimical to our system of comedy? At the St. James's Theatre everything that can be done has been done to give his work its opportunity to win the London public. Décor and costumes are splendid and an invitation to the eye; the cast is so rich in talent that the most finished of all our comedy actresses, Irene Vanbrugh, is used only in the part of the Prince's mother and does not appear until the last act; and the performance is led by Herbert Marshall and Edna Best, than whom there is no more popular pair of actors on the stage.

The result is beyond doubt an extremely brilliant and sparkling entertainment, and the play was well received and will probably enjoy a considerable measure of success. But it was evident to those who regarded it critically that in many respects the interpretation was at war with the author's intention. You felt that you were listening to a story the teller of which had become confused in his own mind. At times the narrative was clear and vigorous, but just when you were settling down to it and beginning to feel that the piece was attaining to the unity of a work of art its motives would suddenly become obscured. You felt inclined, like a child who does not understand a part of the story which is being told to him, to ask "Why?"—and too often there was no answer.

The key to the confusion was, I think, in a misunderstanding of the part of the Professor, who is, after all, the key to the play. To say that Colin Clive plays the part badly would be to do him an injustice, for, granted his own individuality, he plays with high accomplishment and in the only manner which is possible for him. I should prefer to say that he has been very seriously miscast. He is so powerfully romantic a figure that he draws the romance of the play to himself, and the Professor appears in consequence not as a man as pitiable as he is charming to whom the Princess is attracted in a mood of schoolgirlish romanticism, but as one who should provoke, and does provoke, serious passion in her.

Unless you have previously read the play and know how it will end you are continually led into the false supposition that the Prince is no more than a figure of potential marriage de convenance, and that the Professor, transcending his scholasticism, will emerge as the hero who shall carry off the Princess. This misunderstanding is something more than an ordinary misunderstanding of how the play shall end. It affects the entire performance. The light irony of the scene after supper is distorted by it, the kiss which brings down the curtain and is the key to the whole mood of the play seems to be a kiss of passion until it is afterward explained to have been a kiss of pity, and the reconciliation of the Prince and the Princess in the last act, instead of serving as a delicate pointer to the moral of the play, appears as a contradiction of much that has gone before it. The truth probably is that we in England are so bound to our own romantic tradition of Ruritanian drama that we are unable to escape from it into the half-sweet, half-bitter shrewdness of Molnar.

The same heaviness of touch is to be observed in the treatment by Owen Nares of Sacha Guitry's part in "Désiré." The play is a deliberately trivial one telling of the adventures of a French butler whose misfortune was that he invariably fell in love with the lady who employed him and she with him. The particular adventure before our eyes brings him into the house of Mme. Odette at Deauville. Her one object in life is to live respectably so that her protector, a French Cabinet Minister, may be induced to marry her. The butler's single purpose is to avoid a repetition of his amorous experiences in other houses and so retain his place in this one. Their resolutions are all in vain. They begin to dream of each other, to talk in their sleep and to be overheard.

The story reaches its crisis when they find themselves one night sleeping by chance on separate divans in the same room. Awaking suddenly

TWO IN THE SPOTLIGHT

Concerning Wesley Hill, the Angel Gabriel—Herb Williams, of Vaudeville

SINCE actors gifted with enthusiasm are alleged to "live" their rôles, having no greater joy in life than to hurry apace to their theatres, it is the pleasure of the dusky Wesley Hill to propose a nice problem. Mr. Hill, to the gratification of a large portion of the theatregoing public, is Gabriel eight times a week at the Mansfield Theatre in (get ready for this one) a play entitled "The Green Pastures."

In every other rôle he ever took (and in one way or another there have been forty years of rôles that Mr. Hill has taken) he has earned his salary by impersonating some real person in some such sturdy drama as "In Old Kentucky" or "Slavery Days" or "The South Before the War" (that would be the Civil War). But this Gabriel business is quite another matter, having nothing to do with recognizable character, and Mr. Hill likes his work a lot.

"Gangway! Gangway for de Lawd!" shouts Gabriel, flourishing a trumpet with no mean gesture and relishing the notion that no one has quite been Gabriel on a stage before. And, because he is so appreciative a fellow, he will tell you in a reticent way that his rôle is the finest ever written for any actor, which leaves Marc Connelly to take a bow, wherever Mr. Connelly may happen at the moment to be.

To go back a few years, there was a day when Mr. Hill was foisted upon unsuspecting provincials in the Western districts as a Kickapoo Indian boy, which is a good trick if you can do it. His duties in that era were to shout, sing and dance while the "doctor" expounded the virtues of snake oil from the other end of the wagon. This lasted until he (Mr. Hill) buck-and-winged his way into a "Tom" show, where the singing and dancing were augmented by some superior bloodhound barking. Upon his facility in the latter he was at first complimented by his company manager, but tragedy ensued when his heart melted over the plight of a fugitive Eliza. The howls became less vicious and, finally, downright docile. He was fired.

This sharp ending to his "Tom" show adventures occurred in 1892. But, then, almost any one can be a bloodhound, and he proceeded to tour almost continuously in the old favorites until he arrived as the captain of the fleet in "Porgy," thirty-five years later. "Shuffle Along," "Runnin' Wild" and long stretches of vaudeville then occupied his time until they turned over to him this gleaming trumpet.

Concerning the horn, it is important to add that, although its Gabriel has never actually blown it, he assiduously shines it and keeps it in a radiant condition. In the first act he puts it to his lips, and De Lawd gently cautions him. "Watch yo'self, Gabe," He says. And Gabe protests that he wasn't really going to blow it, but only wanted to get the feel of it. He has confided that he sort of wonders what would really happen if he did blow it; if, perhaps, he might bring down a judgment day. Until then Mr. Hill will be one of those actors who like special matinees.

PREFATORIALLY speaking, the name is really not Herb Williams at all, but Herbert Schussler Billerbeck, who at a susceptible age was prevailed upon by his parents to become a church organist. Something seems to have gone wrong. That is to say, assuming that Mr. Williams was originally meant to confine himself to a dim, religious light, there have obviously been complicating factors. For here, of a sudden, he turns up as a featured comedian in Earl Carroll's "Vanities," in which production he is that man who has not been arrested. But, then, he has always been a lad for good, clean fun.

However, in common with his vaudevillian colleagues, the Messrs. Savo and Benny, it is as a revered citizen of the varieties that Mr. Williams has probably had his greatest public. Surely there can scarcely be a vaudeville house left anywhere on the national heath that has not heard his "Oh, those bells!" nor failed to see a frightened cat escape from his debilitated piano. The gentleman in the orchestra pit who has his pate rapped smartly by a baseball bat has endured similar punishment in a thousand cities and hamlets. And who, to ask a rhetorical question, has not seen General Williams recover from a broken piano stool to ponder aloud, "Now that's a treacherous thing!"

It all started in Philadelphia, strangely enough, and, more strangely still, in that city's estimable Conservatory of Music. There the young Williams, still laughably contending that he would be a church organist, fell in with a musician named Woolfus, and such was the debatable influence of the latter that the young men conceived ambitions for vaudeville. A straight musical act, it was to be, but—if you care to believe this frayed item of all theatre beginnings—stage fright and resulting awkwardness made their number a successful burlesque. So it was Williams and Woolfus for fifteen years, and a pretty convulsive pair of fellows they were, too.

Five years ago Mr. Williams, apparently having a notion that America had been seeing a good deal of him, hied himself to Europe to seek employment on the legitimate stage. Between his vaudeville engagements in this country he had appeared in Joe Santley's "All Over Town" in Chicago in 1915, in John Murray Anderson's "What's in a Name" and, in 1924, in Ted Lewis's "Frolics." None of them was impressively successful, but in Berlin Mr. Williams fared well in the Haller Revue—playing, of course, in German—and was featured the following season in "Many Happy Returns," a revue which, aptly enough, endured for more than a year at the Duke of York's Theatre in London.

Homeward-bound from that engagement, the pianist who is death-on-cats returned to the music halls, there continuing his prankish gestures until such time as Mr. Carroll transferred him to the rather more regal spaces of the New Amsterdam. But almost any place that will hold a piano will take care of Mr. Williams.

from their recurrent dreams they find themselves face to face. Two obvious ways lie open to them, one to the bedroom upstairs, the other to renunciation and parting. How on earth does M. Guitry find a middle course between a climax too obvious to be entertaining and an anti-climax that leaves the play with a loose and indecisive conclusion? I do not know. He has a way with him which enables him to defy all the rules of dramatic structure. Mr. Nares, good actor though he is in many parts, is without that personal genius which may have enabled M. Guitry to convert a dull and obvious ending into something brilliantly unexpected.

When the play in Mr. Frith's adaptation was over I found it hard to believe that some unexpected twist of naughtiness had not been bowdlerized out of it. But I am told that the piece is now very much what it was in French. If this is so, its failure must be attributed to the impossibility of replacing Sacha Guitry and Yvonne Printemps in parts that have been made for them. Seymour Hicks seems to be almost the only English actor capable of capturing the Parisian mood of frivolity.

How the temper of English comedy acting has changed during the last generation may be seen from another point of view in the revivals of Wilde's work that have lately appeared. "Lady Windermere's Fan" and "The Importance of Being Earnest" have, by a coincidence, been given in the same week. I have always regarded "The Importance of Being Earnest" as Wilde's masterpiece, for the good reason that in this play alone he has avoided the contamination of nineteenth century melodrama, has preserved his frivolous mood intact, and has founded himself directly upon Congreve through Sheridan.

Because "Lady Windermere's Fan" introduces an element of melodrama, in which Wilde himself had no kind of belief, and mixes it with a sparkling artificiality of dialogue, which was his peculiar strength, the play is almost impossible to perform. If you take it trivially, the main story becomes artistically stiff and unnatural; if you take the story seriously, the trivial dialogue becomes a barrier against sincerity. The almost insoluble problem thus presented was by no means solved at the Everyman Theatre. The melodrama remained as bad melodrama as ever we have seen, and there was nothing for it but to disregard the story, to wait for the passages of wit irrelevant to it, and to enjoy them in detachment.

But "The Importance of Being Earnest," because it is consistent within its own mood, can still be played, and will, I believe, remain a permanent part of English dramatic literature. Sir Nigel Playfair at the Lyric Theatre, Hammersmith, has fantasticated the production of it, using a design for scenery and costume in black and white and silver which is a deliberate adaptation of Aubrey Beardsley. This seems to be a mistake, for when the setting is fantasticated the play is in danger of being burlesqued, and to laugh at Wilde, instead of with him, is to blunt the fine edge of the enjoyment of his masterpiece. Several of the actors in this production are led into playing too broadly. The performances of John Gielgud and Mabel Terry-Lewis stand out as models for the true interpretation of Wilde. They speak fast, lightly and with an exquisite precision; they preserve what it is before all essential to preserve—the musical rhythm of the dialogue; and they never fall into the almost universal and certainly disastrous error of seeming to laugh at their own jokes.

I suppose that if we ever have a national theatre in England "The Importance of Being Earnest" will stand together with "The Way of the World" and "The School for Scandal" as part of the repertory. The performance of it will pass into the academic curriculum. If so it will serve as a valuable corrective to that fashion in modern acting which treats dramatic dialogue as if nothing mattered but its meaning, and sound were relatively unimportant. With Wilde sound is everything. Lose the balance of a sentence and you lose all; slur a consonant and you sacrifice the whole benefit of his style. He is a dramatist who compels formal precision in speech and movement, and of such dramatists we have great need.

VAUDEVILLE

PALACE—Vaudeville, burlesque or "variety," and whether you take it or leave it, seems to offer Harry Richman in what will probably turn out to be some typical Richman songs. And Mr. Richman has become quite a fellow since the old mother house last saw him. Runners-up are Benny Rubin, in some dialectic caricatures, and Dora Maughan, the songstress. Sooner or later, the bill gets around to the Myers, Lubow and Rice Company, Harry and Dorothy Dixon, and Danny Small and Harry Mays.

LOEW'S STATE—Ben Blue, pretty insistently designated as an "international" dancing comedian, is here for the week. Buck and Bubbles are an amusing brace of comicos. Jean Rankin and her Blue Belles, Dixie Hamilton and Le Fleur and Portia complete the program.

FIFTY-EIGHTH STREET—For a headline attraction there is William Kent and Company in a musical bit, along with Bobby Folsom's songs.

PLAYS OUT OF TOWN

SINCE David Belasco's birthday and an Atlantic City opening are beginning to have a way of coinciding, the dean of Forty-fourth Street went duly to that city's Apollo Theatre last week, taking with him actors and settings for that play called "Dancing Partner." It is the drama with which Mr. Belasco, speaking for himself, will declare the season to be open again, as he did last year with the successful frolic called "It's a Wise Child." This time, to mark his seventy-sixth birthday, he offered to the try-out town the adaptation by Frederic and Fanny Hatton of the Hungarian play by Alexander Engel and Alfred Grunwald. Lynne Overman, Irene Purcell, Henry Stephenson, Charlotte Granville, Suzanne Caubaye, Jules Epailly and Gustave Rolland are in it and together with the play they will arrive at Mr. Belasco's own theatre in Forty-fourth Street on Tuesday evening, Aug. 5. As for the plot, reported briefly over the wire to The Philadelphia Inquirer, it appears to suggest the following events:

"The story deals with a ne'er do well young English peer who cares for nothing except his life as a bachelor in Paris. His uncle, also a lord, decides it is about time for the young renegade to marry and for the consideration of paying off his many debts, gets his nephew to promise to marry a girl, hand-picked by the relative.

"Mr. Overman, as the youthful peer, promises to wed providing he can prove, in his own way, that the girl is not one of these so-called moderns. During this experiment Lord Brummel, the nephew, hires himself to the girl as dancing partner, but falls in love within the month and things do not turn out as he planned, although he wins her at the final curtain."

ALTHOUGH it was advertised through the newspapers and other secret channels as a comedy, what took place last week at the Garrick Theatre in Philadelphia under the title of "Ann Vroome," by Lewis Beach, turned out to be a serious enough epic in seven scenes and a number of sighs. Surrounded by members of the Play of the Week Company, Pauline Lord undertook the principal rôle in a play which has at one time or another been mentioned for Broadway without becoming any more imminent than that. To one sitting in an aisle seat and representing The Philadelphia Inquirer, Mr. Beach's play seemed to go like this:

"The seven scenes are in reality merely seven episodes in the life of Ann Vroome during the course of six years after she has refused to marry the man she loves, Boyd Holliday, in order to take care of her aging parents with whom none of their other children cared to be bothered. It did not seem a very substantial reason for such sacrifice, in view of the fact that the man offered to make every concession in order to win her.

"During this period, she has on two occasions at least a few days' stolen holiday with him, which bring down on her head the condemnation of her family, but any hope that the patience of the man might last to the end is dissipated by the author, who drives relentlessly to a depressing finish."

RUSSIAN TALKIE SEEN IN PERSIA

The first sound picture to reach Persia, a Russian production entitled "Volga! Volga!" was recently displayed at the cinema in Teheran. On the opening night the performance was stopped by the police and the proprietors were fined the amount of the evening's receipts on the ground that the apparatus was in reality nothing more than a gramophone. This allegation appears to have been well founded, since the sound equipment consisted of a German talking machine, which played ordinary gramophone records, three in succession if desired, the music having been conveyed to the audience by means of a loud-speaker.

Curiosity was displayed by the Persian at first, but no great enthusiasm has been aroused by this contribution of Western science. It is thought that the proprietors of the Iran, anxious to keep abreast of progress, but unable to afford legitimate sound equipment, have adopted this as a step toward later developments. The Persians, however, are not easily impressed by substitutes for the real article.

A NEW LONDON INVASION

By ERNEST MARSHALL.

LONDON.

ACCORDING to well-founded report the American film invasion of London is to be advanced a new stage by the acquisition of two theatres by the United Artists Corporation. When J. M. Schenck was over here he allowed it to be known that he was studying the question, and rumor had it that he was entertaining the idea of building a "palace" which should be the very last word in cinema architecture. If that really was Mr. Schenck's intention at any time, he appears to have abandoned it in favor of the simpler plan of buying two theatres already in being or at least on the way to construction.

Available sites for new places of entertainment in the central part of London are not to be picked up for a song, nor are they so numerous that a newcomer with architectural ambitions would have an "embarras du choix." Bertie Mayer is one of several native theatrical men who have given particular attention to such opportunities, and, whenever possible, options have been taken on sites which showed signs, even remotely, of coming into the market. It was not only simpler but wiser to look around at existing theatres or projected theatres, and a choice once having been made, there remained nothing more than the question of terms.

Adelphi Under Consideration.

Now London theatredom has not been altogether flourishing in these recent times, and there could be little difficulty in coming to terms with owners who, in view of the conditions prevailing here, were in several cases receiving very low rentals for their property. Buying a theatre outright is a very different proposition from renting one for a probably restricted period.

Murray Silverstone, managing director in this country of United Artists, has just returned from a visit to New York, where he presumably impressed upon Mr. Schenck the strong points in favor of the purchase of an existing theatre rather than the construction of a new one. At any rate, it is understood that Mr. Silverstone has his hands free to conclude a deal by which the United Artists Corporation will become the proprietor of two London theatres.

One of those selected is said to be the Adelphi, in the Strand, one of the best known of London's places of amusement, with a history brimful of love and tradition. The Adelphi is at present undergoing a process of reconstruction, and if the report of its acquisition by the film company turns out to be correct the work may very easily be given a new direction. The other theatre on which Mr. Silverstone is supposed to have set his eye is a new one being erected in Leicester Square. This was originally intended to be the "local home and habitation" of Jack Buchanan, who was expected to become both its manager and its star. Jack is, however, said to have been "bitten" by the films ever since he went to Hollywood to be featured with Irene Bordoni; and he may be ready to relinquish whatever title he holds to the new house in view of the financial inducements which will possibly be set before him by the representative of United Artists.

A Sea Adventure.

In the event of the negotiations now proceeding with respect to these two theatres not being brought to a satisfactory conclusion, Murray Silverstone will not be very downhearted, for he intimates that there are three others that have been offered him. United Artists, he says, certainly requires two theatres in central London for its purposes, for it has in hand no less than nineteen pictures of the first order to show in the British metropolis, the list including three of compelling interest—Charles Chaplin's "City Lights," "Abraham Lincoln," directed by D. W. Griffith, and the much-talked-of "Hell's Angels."

What promises to be an interesting experiment in the making of films of real life is now being completed at British Instructional's studios at Welwyn. A year or more ago two young Australians, Ronald Walker and A. J. Villiers by name, conceived the idea of making a cinematograph record of "life on the ocean wave" as it is lived by the men who go down to the sea in ships, and particularly the sailing ships now fast disappearing from the face of the waters.

Neither Walker nor Villiers had had much experience of photography, nor were they sailors; but they proceeded to buy a movie camera and several thousand feet of negative, and then signed on as seamen before the mast in a sailing ship, the Louise Harwar, which was making a trip from Wallaroo, Australia, to Falmouth, England. The Louise Harwar is the last of the full-rigged ships which used to ply around Cape Horn carrying cargoes of wheat.

The Ship Is the Heroine.

The voyage lasted five months, and during six weeks of this period the vessel encountered very dirty weather. The experiences of the crew were decidedly unpleasant, and at times dangerous, and the two Australians had, of course, to share them all—until one of them, Walker, lost his life in a gale. His companion, Villiers, carried on nevertheless, and when the Louise Harwar arrived at her English port Villiers had with him a number of very remarkable records of the voyage, including some incidents such as that of a cabin boy being carried overboard by a heavy sea.

It was some time before Villiers found a market for his wares, but the courage and resolution he had displayed in carrying through the plans made by Walker and himself served to get him the ear of a director of British Instructional Films. This company then set to work to produce a film for exhibition purposes. A. P. Herbert, a litterateur and humorist whose name is a sufficient guarantee of his ability to handle a theme of the sort, was engaged to write dialogue for the story built around Villiers's seascapes. Interior scenes were shot at the Welwyn studios. There is no woman in the film, but we are assured that there is real love interest enough, and real splendor of womanliness enough about the ship herself and the beauty of her grace and courage.

John Orton is directing the general production of the film, which has been given the name of "Windjammers."

Another slice of real life is shown in a film made by Commander Glen Kidston, R. N., who, accompanied by another young naval officer and a professional photographer, went on a lion "shooting" expedition in Africa. The expedition traveled in motor cars from Mombasa, East Africa, to the shores of Lake Tanganyika. En route they "shot" some wonderful pictures of lions and other denizens of Darkest Africa. One angry lioness chased their cars for a couple of hundred yards.

So far this film has only been shown privately, but it is declared to be too good not to be given to the general public.

By MORDAUNT HALL.

HOLLYWOOD.

WHETHER the cinema-going public is tired of musical shows and revues on the screen is a subject of wide discussion among film producers. Evidently now they have their qualms regarding making these productions, apparently without taking into consideration the merits of the pictures. After having seen some of the scenes for Grace Moore's film "Jenny Lind" (its temporary title) taken, and then hearing the results in a projection room, one can't help thinking that it will be a presentation that will appeal to all. True, it will have an interesting story, one of a romantic conception of Jenny Lind's life.

But if the producers are depressed by the recent returns of musical pictures, by the amazing and sudden rivalry of the miniature golf courses, or the uncertain condition of the foreign market, to an outsider it is quite plain that if the picture is good the makers will reap their reward. Will Rogers hit the nail on the head the other evening when, after hearing paeans of praise for Norma Shearer's film "The Divorcée," and doleful comments on the decreased theatre attendance for which the miniature golf courses were held largely to blame, he asked if "The Divorcée" was making money. He was told it was doing great business. Mr. Rogers then said that so far as he could understand theatre patrons would go and see a good film and that it behooved producers to make more of them.

Notwithstanding, Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, following a study of the motion picture market in English-speaking countries, have virtually decided to have in "The New Moon" as few songs as possible, a decision which is to be regretted considering the singing is to be done by Grace Moore and Lawrence Tibbett, both of whom have presence as well as operatic experience.

Mr. Ziegfeld and the Screen.

Florenz Ziegfeld, who has been here for an extended stay, is a firm believer in the audible screen and the other day he told this correspondent that he felt sure the public would go to see musical films and screen revues provided they were well done. He was not in the least surprised that most of the shadow revues should have failed to attract business; he concluded that they did not deserve success. Mr. Ziegfeld said that he would resume doing his stage Follies, because he considered that type of entertainment, which he has been providing for twenty-four years, a national institution.

"Every day I pick up a newspaper," said Mr. Ziegfeld, "I see some mention of a girl who was in the Follies. The word 'Follies' has been used indiscriminately in moving pictures. In the transference of most musical shows to the screen, the first thing the film makers do is to use as little as possible of the original production."

Mr. Ziegfeld said that one of his shows was put on the screen without a single thing he recognized. He said that people went to see a musical comedy or a revue because it was a good entertainment.

"Good, really good, entertainment is what is wanted," said Mr. Ziegfeld.

He said that one great difficulty in trying out screen productions is that one can never be sure where laughter or applause will come. Therefore it is a great advantage in filming a stage production if the producer of the parent work, in making the film, knows where to expect laughter and applause.

"Because of the long run on the stage of 'Whoopee,' I knew where the applause and laughs would come," said Mr. Ziegfeld. "Incidentally the principals in the film, with two exceptions, appeared in the original work.

"At a recent preview of 'Whoopee' one man counted twenty-two laughs in the first reel and after that he stopped counting. It is one thing to get a laugh with a film and quite another matter to develop the funny situation intelligently.

"Regarding pictures, audible as they are now, I think that while nothing will take the place of flesh and blood entertainment, the screen will serve as an advantage to stage musical shows. It is my idea to produce such stage shows far more elaborately than ever before; then, after the show has been performed in New York and the key cities, I intend to film it in perfect form, utilizing the customs and almost everything but the scenery. We will, of course, take full advantage of the camera's scope and, when the time comes, of the wide films.

An Audience Helps.

"'Whoopee' was photographed in Technicolor and while I am associated in the film production with Samuel Goldwyn, I think I might be permitted to say that this production seems to me to be highly satisfactory."

Mr. Ziegfeld commented upon the work of the screen players, explaining that a comedian could exercise his talent far more effectively before a theatre audience than before a microphone.

"There is an exhilarating effect in a round of applause for the theatre performer. The screen player has to go through his lines with only the director, camera man, electricians and others before him and the stillness is such that one could hear the proverbial pin drop. Such conditions cannot inspire the player in the same way as he would be by a packed house of expectant and appreciative faces."

Mr. Ziegfeld mentioned this advantage of the stage in connection with the advisability of engaging for the film performers who had worked in the stage production. In weighing attendance, he said that "while a stage contribution might after two years attract 1,000,000 persons, the film of the same subject might play to fifty times that number."

The big mistake that most of the motion picture producers are making is that of being too greedy. An author may hope his book will appeal to the millions, but he does not expect it to do so. A playwright likewise knows that he can't cater to both the unintelligent and the intelligent, but the motion picture producer gauges every picture by the gross receipts and if it only makes a nominal profit he is disappointed. He seldom stops to think that what is one man's meat is another man's poison, and also that an actor who has appeared in unpopular films may, when cast in the productions suitable to him, bring home the bacon. Nobody bothered about Will Rogers because his old silent films were financial failures, but Winfield Sheehan, a far-seeing producer, realized that Mr. Rogers might be highly successful if suitable vehicles were selected for the cowboy comedian.

Mr. Rogers's Activities.

And it is a matter of record that Mr. Rogers won great popularity among the cinema-going public by his first talking film, "They Had to See Paris." His second production, "So This Is London," under the Fox banner, is enjoying great favor, even in Hollywood, where it is still running at the Cathay Circle Theatre. Mr. Sheehan's rivals may have further cause to regret their lack of enterprise when Mr. Rogers comes out in a vocalized film version of "Lightnin'," and they may tear their hair when this inimitable comedian is presented in a free audible pictorial adaptation of Mark Twain's fantasy, "A Connecticut Yankee at the Court of King Arthur." And after that will come another feature wherein Rogers will be in his element, "See America First."

Little is heard here of "A Lady of Scandal," probably one of the best talking film adaptations of a play, but that does not alter the fact that intelligently produced efforts such as that was eventually will be in greater demand that the inept bits of frivolity that appear all too frequently in motion-picture theatres.

One of the principal reasons for the lack of success of sensible films is that the film salesman—he who disposes of the film to the theatre managers—is not always qualified to deal with pictures beyond the moronic mind. He is often more than cold on a really praiseworthy effort, whereas he will pour forth a stream of vernacular panegyrics for some puerile thing in which a basketball game is won by the hero at the last minute.

"Disraeli" and the Salesmen.

For that reason the success of George Arliss is all the more remarkable, for this go-getting type of salesman had to let his patrons know that here was Arliss, an English actor, perhaps unheard of at the moment to the theatre manager, in a story of wit and connivance, dealing specifically with a Jewish Prime Minister in Victoria's reign outwitting the Russians in gaining possession of the Suez Canal. One can imagine the theatre-owner asking for the title, and on being informed it was "Disraeli" shrugging his shoulders and mumbling a query about the sex-appeal angle.

It was the huge success that this picture met with in New York that caused it to be talked about as the "best talking film made." Even the high-powered salesman felt that there was something to this film which he could not understand, and, proving that motion-picture audiences want intelligent entertainment, the readers of Photoplay Magazine from all sections of the country voted to give this production the annual gold medal.

So far as the much-discussed miniature golf courses are concerned, one might be justified in presuming that they would sound their own death-knell. For, as if there were not enough in and around Los Angeles, not to speak of other sections of California, not a day passes without new ones being constructed. On every vacant lot these putting courses, which are none too good for a real golf player's putting, are thronged so that there is a wait at every tee, and at others where there are but a few players people are busy making fun of the royal and ancient game. Persons who have never stepped on a real golf green are said to be among the district champions of these courses, of which there are now upward of 2,500 in California.

The feats performed by the Graf Zeppelin perhaps have inspired two forthcoming productions, one of which is C. B. De Mille's "Madame Satan," and the other, "Dirigible," from a story by John Monk Saunders (author of "Wings"), which will be turned into an audible film by young Howard Hughes, who is probably the only producer here who does not have to worry about funds, or, at least, about the amount of money he contributes to a picture. Under the name of Caddo Productions he has made several pictures, including that excellent production, "Two Arabian Knights." It is also this same Mr. Hughes who spent something like $4,000,000 on "Hell's Angels," which is soon to be presented in New York.

Notes on C. B. De Mille.

Mr. De Mille said one day last week that he had one sequence in "Madame Satan" depicting a ball aboard a Zeppelin. Something happens and the dirigible's passengers are forced to desert the ship. All the dancers glide over the dirigible floor, fully prepared for an emergency by wearing special parachutes. In fact, Mr. De Mille said that he thought that these safety devices were so ingenious that he regretted that he had not applied for a patent on them.

This producer has odd ideas, including a desire to dominate the scene when some persons call upon him. He uses bright lights to study the expressions of visitors and is said to have an uncomfortable chair so that he can watch persons trying to look comfortable when they are ill at ease.

The fact that some, and not a few, persons do not agree with Mr. De Mille about his productions amuses rather than vexes him. He is a good sport who is not precisely noted for his modesty. At luncheon he deprecated the idea of changing titles of books and plays for the film offspring, particularly when a frenzied attempt was made to appeal to passing moths before a flaming theatre marquee. This same producer nevertheless took all manner of liberties with Sir James Barrie's play, "The Admirable Crichton," which, because it was feared some persons would expect Crichton to be an officer of high naval rank instead of a highly intelligent butler, emerged from the film studio as "Male and Female."

But be that as it may, Mr. De Mille has amassed a great fortune out of his pictures, and even if he does dote on polar bear rugs and Italian bells at the door of his studio luncheon room, he does not resent anybody disagreeing with him; that is, provided one is not a member of his staff and is not engaged in either mapping out or directing a picture. But perhaps after all that has been said about him Mr. De Mille might intentionally humor a daring no-man by listening to him to see the effect it might have on the physiognomy of the victim as well as on the camera men, electricians, carpenters and the youngster who follows at Mr. De Mille's heels, not to mention the actors.

ON THE SCREEN HORIZON

ADOLPHE MENJOU, a rather stormy petrel for a period during which he went to France and appeared there in a French talking picture, has at last been readmitted into the English-speaking film ranks, for he will appear in the Marlene Dietrich-Gary Cooper photoplay, "Morocco." M. Menjou, it will also be noted, is not the star of the piece, but will be cast as the villain.

Richard Halliburton's book, "The Royal Road to Romance," will be made into a film by Fox.

Universal's imported film, "The White Hell of Pitz Palu," will be made more dramatic by the addition of Graham McNamee's voice. This silent picture, which was produced in the Swiss Alps, has a story retailing the adventures of a husband, his wife and a strange Dr. Johannes Krafft. Mr. McNamee will explain things as the celluloid unwinds, apparently in the manner of the old nickleodeon days.

Charles Chaplin, known at times as a lawn-tennis enthusiast and at others as a maker of films, recently told the Hollywood correspondent of The London Daily News and Chronicle that he will be in New York for the première of "City Lights," and will go to England immediately thereafter. In England he intends to have conversations with Sir James Barrie, H. G. Wells, Sir Philip Sassoon and others. Mr. Chaplin playfully suggested that in order to avoid the crowds that usually surround his goings and comings he is more than likely to raise a beard to avoid recognition.

Ginger Rogers, the young lady who so arduously and repeatedly demanded cigarettes of the hero in "Young Man of Manhattan" and who will soon do as much in "Queen High," will not, as previously announced, travel to the celluloid coast for work in Irving Berlin's musical film. Instead she is to have the leading feminine rôle in Ed Wynn's forthcoming "Manhattan Mary," which will be started at the New York studio of Paramount next month. Miss Rogers also appeared opposite Jack Oakie in "The Sap From Syracuse."

NEW PICTURES

LUXURIOUS apartments, a bank and a night club all are seen in "Good Intentions" as well as Edmund Lowe, Regis Toomey and Marguerite Churchill. This film at the Roxy, while not definitely classed as an underworld yarn, has leanings in that direction and there is some gun play in the more forceful interludes.

WHEN a caddy inherits a million and is mistaken for a prominent young engineer it is a film story. This is what happens in "The Sap From Syracuse," the photoplay at the Paramount, in which Jack Oakie and Ginger Rogers have the featured rôles. A good deal of the action takes place aboard a transatlantic steamer.

"SINS OF THE CHILDREN," with Louis Mann, is the attraction at the Capitol. It is the story of a German barber who sacrifices his every chance for success to help his children out of difficulties, but is repaid only by ungrateful acts on their part. Leila Hyams, Mary Doran, Robert Montgomery and Elliott Nugent have supporting rôles in this drama.

"THE LAW OF THE SIBERIAN TAIGA," now at the Cameo, is the Soviet film in which the customs of the natives of the Tungus tribe in the Siberian wastes are shown. The picture was made by V. I. Baranov, a Russian scientist, who headed an expedition into the territory.

THE BEACON is offering "Dumbbells in Ermine," a comedy classified as a "human chronicle depicting the difficulties experienced by a handsome young pugilist and a pretty girl." Robert Armstrong appears as the boxer and Barbara Kent as the girl. James Gleason wrote the dialogue.

A MOMBASA "dive," which is the vernacular for a tropical night club, is one of the settings for "Golden Dawn," the picture at the Strand in which Walter Woolf, Vivienne Segal, Noah Beery, Alice Gentle and Lupino Lane have featured rôles. The story is filmed in colors and mostly out of doors.

THE French film, "Miracles of the Wolves," is at the Fifth Avenue Playhouse. This is the silent historical film dealing with a period of French history. It was previewed several years ago but never shown publicly.

SOME OF THE NEWER FILMS

William Powell a Criminal Lawyer in "For The Defense"—Divers Items

IT is not often that an attorney who has won fame and fortune by keeping his constituents out of "the big house" takes the train up the river himself. If last week's screen contributions did nothing else, they showed that even that situation is possible. The pictures, like life, are making an ado about cleaning up the bar.

The films of the week just over were not startling save in a fashion that was not to their advantage. For that reason, perhaps, "For the Defense" is apt to stand out like a neat bit of black lettering. Perhaps it would stand out just a little in any week, although certainly to no such extent. It is good entertainment—even for those who are not lawyers.

William Powell, who has by now pretty well run the gamut of all things appertaining to the underworld, is its star performer. He goes through the picture with the Powell manner of suave abandon. Calmness is the attitude of William Foster, noted criminal lawyer, a blandness that is not shattered even when he is pleading guilty to the crime of jury bribing. It is for this, of course, that he is sent to join his former clients at Ossining.

"For the Defense" is perhaps designed for the New York field—at least for those who are acquainted with its various spots. The picture opens with a short portrayal of the famous Bridge of Sighs, and later on there are moments of Broadway, the criminal courts and the Tombs. Finally there is a scene at the door of the prison up in Westchester.

The story is of an attorney who stubbed his toe now and then but never fell. He was able to get clients off, even against the weight of evidence. The underworld was, collectively, his friend, and individually his life's work. His main failing was a nervous desire for stimulant—the only way he could "keep going in this racket."

Everything went well until his girl got into an affair and the other member of the triangle went on trial for manslaughter. Foster was defense attorney, of course. A ring was introduced, a ring that the lawyer recognized as his own. He sought the cup that cheers, and then acceded to the jury-bribing. Placed on trial himself, he pleaded guilty in order to save his friends. And so—up the river.

That Younger Generation.

EVERY so often—perhaps much too often—there comes a picture to explain what is wrong with the younger generation. This is the generation, it will be remembered, which is sometimes called post-war. It is, if the screen conception be true, a generation that never will amount to much, save in the way of all that is lawless.

At any event, the problem is tackled once again in "Wild Company." Young men go to cabarets, with their attendant evils of drink, entertainers and theme songs, and the hero ultimately is tried for a murder. Then the lesson is ruled in; the learned judge explains that the fault is as much of the father as of the son. And that is that.

H. B. Warner has the rôle of the father, a difficult one because of its mad scamperings. Frank Albertson is the son and Claire McRowell the mother. George Fawcett takes the part of the judge who gives the ruling. Mr. Fawcett is excellent—save for the speech he has been forced to make.

A Reptilian War Film.

IT occasionally appears that reptiles are the coming stars of the pictures. Not so long ago there was the cobra that died valiantly after a fight with a mongoose. And more recently there has been a battle between two snakes—one of them deadly. The latest addition to the life of the serpents occurs in "Mysteries of Nature," a Ufa film.

The two snakes in question are the jararaca and musurana, the first deadly and the second protected by thick, black skin. In their battle, the jararaca strikes at its foe until its poison sacs are exhausted, and then the other begins the slow process of eating it. The musurana starts its dinner tail first, the jararaca all the time trying to strike it with its fangs.

The fight forms the climax of the film, which starts with the microscopic algae and goes upward through the scarabs, reptiles and sea lions—and other plant and animal life—pointing out the means of subsistence in the parasitic zoological kingdom.

The Foreign Legion Again.

NEW versions—or at least other versions, perhaps not new—of life in the Foreign Legion and on Devil's Island are contained in "Hell's Island." There are adventures in the wars against the Riffs and adventures in the penal colony lately made famous by the screen.

The theme has as its central figures Griff and Mac and a girl named Marie. The two men are soldiers—their language proves it, if not their actions. At one time Mac is shot in the back. He thinks Griff did it, but, of course, that is not so.

Scene two shows Griff as an inmate of the penal colony. Mac is, of course, a guard. The latter makes it possible for his friend to escape from there with the girl.

Ralph Graves takes the part of Griff and Jack Holt that of Mac. Dorothy Sebastian has the rôle of Marie.

DIME MOVIES PERSIST

In Thickly Populated Neighborhoods They Still Cater to Enthusiastic Patrons

TUCKED away in the inscrutable fastnesses of the lower east side, Hell's Kitchen, or the Red Hook quarter of Brooklyn, there stand today as living monuments to the origin of a great art the last local remnants of an American institution—the dime movie houses. Unheralded and unsung—in the fashion of countless heroes—these modest emporiums of "flicker," so dear to the hearts of our childhood, have seen their days—and nights, as well.

Being something less than divine, they have gone the way of all things outworn, fondly remembered but seldom mourned—true to their original trust to the end. For in these out-of-the-way houses—pretentious of prosperity but scorning the ways of progress—blood still flows across the silver screen, six-shooters still bark and villains sneer—and the melodrama in all its pristine glory takes its last brave stand.

In a day and time when Broadway has pearls of greater price to offer in the line of cinema entertainment, none but the brave and about fifty thousand persons who like their movies rough, tough and nasty make it a point to patronize the old-time "five and tens." Or perhaps it's fifty million. The point, like the quality of mercy, is not strained. Enough people attend to make it worth while. The arts have various devotees.

What Price Comfort.

Nor are the patrons of these lowly neighborhood dispensers of cheer exacting in their tastes. When Summertime comes to New York, for instance, and the thermometer begins to emulate a mountain-goat in its ascent, then the palatial movie houses along and around Broadway simply throw the switch on their mammoth refrigerators, hang out the sign—"30 degrees cooler inside"—and wait for the world to beat a path to the cool of their darkened interiors. The pavements sizzle, but one breath from the inner depths suggests all the reputed attractions of Spring in the Antarctic—and the flesh is weak.

Within, the latest thing in sophisticated cinematographic art flashes upon the screen, a sixty-piece orchestra is deliberately elevated out of nowhere, and a pony chorus daintily dances across a shadowy stage, attired in abbreviated Eskimo costumes which leave the lower limbs unhampered by everything but a glaring paradox.

Such tempting morsels are not for those who have no more than a thin white dime—a shiny nickel in case you are under 12—to spend upon their afternoon's or evening's entertainment. They are not for those who prefer to remain east of Avenue A surrounded by congenial friends and companions of sympathetic tastes. Nor are they for those who are not squeamish when blood is spilled, and spilled thick.

Few—all too few—of the old-time houses are left. On the lower east side, where the movie is something of an educational institution (of dubious example) as well as a source of delight, even the erstwhile piano, hammered upon by a bald-headed Italian, has seen its day as the purveyor of musical accompaniment and has passed on to its well-earned reward. The irresistible target for spit-balls has been displaced by modern invention. The humblest have been "wired for sound"—though the quality of the sounds may be challenged.

Wraiths Dance; Demons Play.

The houses themselves, their patrons, and the fanciful content of their "feature attractions" have been unaltered by time, however—unstaled by custom. Their beckoning exteriors, sandwiched in the middle of a block of fire-escaped tenements, still flourish under the embellishment of flaming posters, proclaiming to all the world that within may be seen "Four Sensational and Thrilling Features," for the paltry sum of one dime, the tenth part of a dollar. The same group of small fry, which all can remember from the little town in Southern Ohio, still stand around, debating or looking longingly toward the dark doorway, patiently waiting and raising silent supplications for the price of admission—one nickel. It goes without saying that the audiences are composed in the main of juveniles. Youth, ah, youth!

To the neophyte—in point of experience—entering an east side movie house on a hot Summer afternoon, there lies in wait an adventure. In the first place, such havens have an aura—better said aroma—all their own. It is a mixture of lemon drop, stray dog, penny chocolate, and child. It is indescribable. It is overpowering.

Before his eyes become accustomed to the inky interior he will find himself beset on all sides by wraithlike forms which touch and go, flit and flutter, hither and yon, like soulless demons in the Avernian depths. When his optical sense is somewhat restored he will discover somewhat to his relief—for the moment—that the creatures are nothing more than patrons of the place, making of the occasion more of a sporting event or informal garden party than a cinema performance. It seems to be an unwritten rule with the youthful members of a "five and ten" audience that they should sit still in no one seat for a longer period than five minutes. The result is a general shifting about—quite distracting to one who has not been schooled in the catch-as-catch-can method.

Local interest is also fostered by an occasional foot-race up and down the aisles or an impromptu boxing bout in the lower left-hand corner under the screen. For emergency's sake, a figurative Mr. Scrooge—usually a portly and somewhat world-weary gentleman—marches through the aisles to see that no material damage is done—to the theatre. This gentleman's profession is to keep order, and he does so by issuing peremptory commands at frequent intervals demanding quiet. His outbursts of vocabulary are met with brief moments of deadly silence, followed by a slow return of subdued voices which, wavelike, increase in volume until cacophony once more reigns—and the command is barked once more. For the uninitiated, it comes as something of a shock, putting it mildly, to have a basso-profundo roar immediately behind one's back, "Shut up down there, youse!"

Occasionally, when threats have lost their potency with individuals—those individuals who have seen the show through three times and are becoming as a consequence a bit restive—the ineffective repetition of the order to "shut up" is followed by a gentle but firm removal of the offender from his seat, and a smooth but precipitous emission from the place entirely. Nobody thinks the least thing of it—not even the offender. Save for a possible momentary stir or chorus of catcalls while the baliff is retrieving a recalcitrant practical joker of diminutive form who has slithered under his seat and bobbed up three rows back, the audience remains unaffected. An episode missed or a sequence dropped is always caught up on the next time around.

At night, it is true, when the toil of the day is over, the audience becomes more mature in point of years—though its taste in entertainment remains unaltered. Husbands who know what the inside of a storage warehouse or the hold of a vessel looks like, wives who have seen the bottom of a wash tub, sons and lovers, congregate in the gloom to laugh and cheer, weep and gasp, or just to hold hands. The bailiff doesn't have to work so hard at night.

Every one who has ever been young enough to go to moving pictures when they were in the day of their wildest abandon can form a faint idea of the subject matter of the thrillers which still flash upon the screens of the cheaper and lustier houses. Dastardly villains still stroke phenomenal mustachios, .38-calibre revolvers still smoke like locomotives on an upgrade, and cowboy lovers still sit in hammocks with their sweethearts and fail to remove their sombreros. Nor has the art of vaulting onto the back of a mustang degraded one whit with the years.

Courage Counts—and Beauty.

Plot, as always, is a matter of secondary importance. Deeds count—and the more ferocious the better. Like the generation before them, the youthful devotees of the dime movie are still connoisseurs of gun play. Cheers and hisses are indulged without stint—vociferously and at length.

In praise of the discrimination of the east side youth be it said that the two things which call for the most sincere and whole-hearted applause are a beautiful woman and a gentlemanly act of courage. The same sensibility is extended to the social relations of the audience with one another.

Alice Gentle and Noah Beery in "Golden Dawn."

The other day a lad of no more than 10 years had escorted his little sister to a dime movie house considerably south and east of Union Square. During the course of the performance some little stir was caused by the arrival in the same row of several lads of slightly more advanced years. A mild furor was created, and little sister suddenly emitted a yell. Brother made hasty inquiries, and then arising, with the true spirit of the cavalier, turned to the arriving lads and remarked in an admonitory tone:

"Say, what's the idea of hitting her?"

NOTES OF THE BERLIN SCREEN

By C. HOOPER TRASK.

BERLIN.

CAN you remember Henny Porten? Think back to the historic days of the German film and you may be able to recall the Ann Boleyn whom Lubitsch chose as protagonist to Jannings' Henry VIII. That was the height of this actress's career, her only plunge into the sea of internationalism. Otherwise she has remained the most Teutonic of the German film stars and, perhaps, just for this reason, for many years the greatest favorite. She started her career back in the days when they were turning out those excruciating shorts which now add merriment to a drooping program. Clad in long, wide flowing robes she bemoaned the loss of her little baby, just taken to heaven by an angel with cardboard wings, or she called loudly on the Fates to avenge her for what the long, sleek, black-whiskered villain had done to her virtue. Later, she developed into an actress and in some of the pictures made around the year 1920, especially Hauptmann's "Rose Berndt," she reached tragic depth. I am sure I shall not surprise you at all when I report that she is distinctly buxom of build and that her hair has the shimmer of gold about it.

Based on Stage Play.

And now Henny has made her first talker. Like Greta Garbo and Gloria Swanson she speaks and even, unfortunately, sings. But her ardent admirers will probably not be annoyed by that and, from their viewpoint, they will be perfectly right, for Henny Porten is the essence of all that they admire. She is the German middle-class ideal with its solid vitality, with its coquettishness coated with just a trifle too much sugar. Is it any wonder that they storm the box office to view her?

The picture in which she is now desporting herself at the Ufa Palast is called "Scandal About Eva," founded on a stage play of a like name. Eva is a school teacher who is engaged to a Minister of Education. She discovers that he has an illegitimate child of which he has never informed her and she adopts it without his knowledge. The natural consequence is that she is suspected of being its mother and her fiancé is not too gracious to her about it.

The members of the school board are drawn into the matter because she refuses to resign and they are threatened with the exposure of their respective pasts unless she goes. They all have committed some mild moral lapses and are terrified of an attack in the papers. A usable structure on which to hang a comedy but, sadly enough, the director, Papst, whom I had occasion to praise a short time ago for his excellent "The Western Front 1918," has taken too ponderous a tempo. After even the shortest scenes there is a lengthy fade-out and the pantomimic slowness of the old silent days continually creeps in.

"Tenderness" is the name of a talker directed by Richard Loewenbein which had its German première at the Universum. The first night audience of this house, which has been kicking up a lot of rucktions lately, showed none of the quality of mercy, let alone tenderness, about its reception of this work. And who can blame them, for it certainly reached bedrock. The scenario, founded on a play by Henri Bataille, is another one of those triangle contraptions. In this day and age it seems almost unbelievable that a French playwright of note can turn out such ware, and it is even more bewildering to realize that any one would produce it. The sophistication of the boulevards is evidently one of the grand myths kept alive by the manufacturers of perfumes and the designers of woman's apparel.

Next to being a censor the most unpleasant job is to be a member of a prize competition committee, for the only person who is ever satisfied with the decision is the one who gets first place.

FILM FLASHES FROM STUDIOS

AFTER a lapse of some time tinted films seem to be returning to favor again, for Warners have announced that "Fifty Million Frenchmen" will be made in technicolor. "Whoopee," the Samuel Goldwyn-Florenz Ziegfeld film, has also undergone the coloring process, as have various other features of all the major producers. First National will soon make technicolor offerings of "Bright Lights," with Dorothy Mackaill, "Woman Hungry," with Lila Lee, and "Toast of the Legion," with Edward Everett Horton.

Paramount, too, will soon release "Follow Thru," a Charles Rogers picture, and Radio Pictures will offer "Dixiana," in which Bebe Daniels does some singing. While there has not been a profusion of color films along Broadway recently, the Roxy has within the past two months exhibited three technicolored photoplays.

Lew Cody, a former screen star, is staging what is popularly termed a comeback in talking pictures. He will be seen opposite Gloria Swanson in "What a Widow!" and will have the leading rôle in "A Husband's Privileges," a forthcoming Warner production. Irene Delroy is to play the leading feminine rôle.

In order to give an authentic atmosphere in "Outside the Law," Universal converted the Bank of Italy, in Los Angeles, into a temporary sound studio and within five hours of its soundproofing had the film in the developing room. Tod Browning, the director, utilized a real bank so that he would not have to make exteriors and interiors in different places.

Universal will indulge in a little horseplay when "See America Thirst" emerges from the Hollywood archives of that company. Slim Summerville, who appeared to such advantage in "All Quiet," will be seen with Harry Langdon, heretofore of the stuffed cheeks and baby-stare, in this film. Jeanette Loff, a blonde, will lead the boys on.

While a type of American generally termed "Lo the poor Indian" has been neglected in more ways than in not preserving his bison, it remains for Carl Laemmle of Universal to come forward with a "How" on his lips in deference to our early settlers. The form of the tribute is a picture called "The Indians are Coming," a serial of sorts which may be a revival as far as the Indian is concerned. This continued picture will have Indian language scenes in which Tim McCoy and Chief Thunderbird will interpret the sign language.

Now that dogs have acquired the voices of humans, in the talking pictures that is, Tiffany Productions goes Metro one better and grafts the speaking voice on our nearer relation, the chimpanzee. Without benefit of Darwin a chimpanzee family will air its domestic troubles in a series of comedies, the first of which is entitled "The Blimp Mystery."

MUSICAL CREATION

Present Technical and Critical Activities Preparation for "Golden Age"

By OLIN DOWNES.

LAST Sunday in these columns there was comment upon the prevailing dearth of creative power in the music of today. is not astonishing that under such nditions the attention of musicians d critics has been devoted to two incipal things—to the development a more and more complete and exible musical technic, and to a reamination of the music of the past. hat is the temper of this period in t, and it is very important and luable to the future. If composers e doing little but milling about and arpening their tools, they are vertheless preparing the ground—st as generations of composers prered the ground for J. S. Bach—for e master of the future who in his od time will come.

Criticism meanwhile is actively d fruitfully at work clearing ay accumulated rubbish of the st records and estimates of art out as reliable as the findings the imaginative, enthusiastic and orly informed savants, doctors, ystics, and what not, of the Middle ges. Criticism, especially in Europe, instituting gradually methods of search and open-minded inquiry to questions of history and esthets that bear importantly upon the usical problems of the present, and fford perspective for the years to me.

"Back to Bach" is not the only ovement tending toward rediscovy of the past, and consequently iscovery of the place of the present music. We now begin to realize he genius of Lassus and Monteverdi efore him; and of Josquin Desrés and Ockhegm before them. Critcism of the romantic, explosive, gotistical nineteenth century negatd everything that had been done in usic in the past. Critics and musiians are only now becoming cognint of all that the amazing eigheenth century, for example, bestowed upon them with its art. Thus the musical horizon is widening for s, and music at last is taking the osition for the artist and the intellectual person long occupied by literature, sculpture, painting and other expressive arts.

SIMULTANEOUSLY with this new critical, historical and esthetic advance is proceeding a process f considerably more importance to the proverbial man in the street, who s less interested in where the human ace is going than in his individual experiences and the things he can observe around him. That is the amazing rapidity and extent of the circulation of good music through the medium of the machines.

The records, the radio, the movietone—notwithstanding the defects of their virtues already mentioned—these are agents of incalculable importance to the reception and the understanding of great music by modern society. It almost seems as if the art had found it necessary to pause a moment, that its richness and its significance might be absorbed by the democracy of the whole world before it moved forward another momentous step. For the first time everybody can hear in more or less recognizable and eloquent reproduction music by nearly all of the great composers known to us. This is almost an accidental result of the incredible scientific developments of this twentieth century—a by-product of the conquests of the air and invisible space and divisible atoms. By virtue of these discoveries, music is heard by every one at the moment of performance, or in preserved form by which the score and the performance can be repeated ad infinitum and every detail of it made clear to the ear and the memory. Machines are doing what could have been done by no other medium, and in the end it will be principally through such and similar instrumentalities that the abiding treasures of the tonal art will be familiar in every household.

These treasures, as the artistically untutored are now discovering so rapidly, have only to be known to be loved. By these means the process of musical infiltration, which could only be incomplete in preceding centuries, is now in order in every hamlet in the country and ranch in the West and ship on the high seas. There is no exaggerating this marvel, or the effect which it is going to have on the musical consciousness of the whole human race. So that, if we are not progressing musically in the creative field, we are moving rapidly forward in knowledge and love of music, the rear-guard fetching up with the foremost columns of the cultural army. The masters of composition are at last becoming articulate to those with whom they really desired to converse—not with a few artists and specialists only, but with all the men and women in the great wide world.

THESE are processes of preparation. A new creative period in music is obviously ahead, though we may wait some time for it to arrive. A hundred years of a special movement in music were inaugurated by the intellectual and political revolutions that came at the end of the eighteenth century. We of the early twentieth century stand in a similar relation to a period of immense upheaval which may not yet have completed its processes. The parallels are obvious, and they are not farfetched. Only, the new conditions and ideas of this age are far more complex and far-reaching than those of a century ago, and it may take proportionately the longer for the creative balance to arrive in the consciousness of the composer.

The expression of a new intellectual or emotional current comes in music usually some years after the event. One reason for this is probably that music comes from a source so much deeper than that of the conscious mind. Music is less what a man does or thinks than what he and his age are. Hence the romanticism of a Jean-Jacques Rousseau appearing in literature and reappearing years later in the music of a Beethoven and a Berlioz. The power of a young and romantic Germany is felt in the scores of a Weber, but gathers full force half a century later with the maturity of a Wagner, and drops into decadence and inflated rhetoric with the music of the later Strauss. Sometimes, in a highly cultured society, where musicians and poets mingle with special intimacy, there is a more immediate correspondence between two arts, as in the relations between Debussy and the French impressionistic and symbolistic poets. They had their roots in an ancient. We are suspended, temporarily at least, between a past and a future.

We have now upon us one of the most momentous centuries the world has known. Thought is immensely confused. The most catastrophic of wars blasts nerves and imaginations, changes the face of the globe and the whole psychology of society. Explorers and scientists unfold marvel after marvel so quickly that the mind has not become receptive to one miracle before another has obliterated its track.

BY and by, in nature's course, there will be a movement of equilibrium before the next step in human evolution occurs. It is in such moments of pause and digestion of experience that it is most natural for music to pour forth—as she poured forth, for instance, in England after the defeat of the Spanish Armada as she poured forth in Europe of the Renaissance and in Germany after 1813. It is at such times, as a rule, that music and other arts expand, and we have another "golden age" in the turbulent and painful evolution of the race.

But we do not have to console ourselves by looking ahead, because of the immense riches we have at hand and the tasks that immediately confront us. We have a great deal to do, an immense deal to enjoy and countless marvels to contemplate. We shall find engrossing occupation and much thrilling experience in participating in what the hour affords, and in clearing house for the next great experience.

ST. PAUL'S NEW ORGAN

THE new organ in St. Paul's Cathedral is now at last ready for playing. Some of the numerous improvements include novel tone-colors and all-electrical control. There are in all five keyboards. As was expected, the instrument was heard at the state opening of the cathedral on June 25. The most important of the improvements which make this organ one of the finest in the world, according to an interview given to The Sunday Referee by the builder, Mr. Willis, "has been the scrapping of the obsolete pneumatic mechanism and its replacement of all-electric connection of modern pattern. It will mean an enormous 'speed up' in the response of the pipes to the organist's fingers.

"The old mechanism dated from 1872, when my grandfather astonished an incredulous dean and chapter by his proposal to move the old Wellington movement and divide the organ into two sections on each side of the chancel, with pneumatic tubes connecting them under the floor of the chancel.

"It was a wonderfully bold thing to do for those days, and very successful, though today, with electricity to aid us, we think nothing of separating the organist seventy feet or so from his instrument.

"The electric wire I am using for the new action runs into many miles, and the contacts are of special precious metals.

"The trompette militaire is a reed-stop of new pattern and great power, which I am adding to the tuba organ. It will certainly awake the echoes in Wren's great dome as it peals out with the full organ. It is the first of its kind in this country.

"I am also adding a contra violone stop of pedal pipes up in the gallery under the dome. One of these giants measures nearly forty feet long and is big enough for a boy to get inside and lie down quite comfortably. Cranes had to be used to haul these giant pipes into place.

"In addition, various other new stops (including a new pattern French horn) are being added to the instrument which will bring the total number of stops up to eighty-seven. There will be about 5,000 pipes in all. The organ is one of the very few in this country to have five manuals."

After hearing it, the correspondent of The London Times asked "all those who design, build or pay for organs in any place of worship to note that St. Paul's Cathedral organ contains no 'Vox Humana' nor any such specification as a tremulant." The swell organ remains untouched.

THE RISE OF THE AMERICAN COMPOSER

To the Editor of The New York Times:

I READ with great interest Mr. Grosbayne's article in Sunday's TIMES on the "Rise of American Composers." His statistics are very interesting. However, I find one serious omission. I attended the New York concerts of the Boston and Philadelphia Orchestras and one of the series of the Philharmonic. But the most significant American composition I heard during the entire season was Karl Ruggles's "Portals," given by the Conductorless Symphony Orchestra. This orchestra performed five American works in their six concerts. Two of these I considered important, the Ruggles work mentioned above and Henry Cowell's "Tone Cluster" concerto.

For the sake of completing the record in the Sunday TIMES, I want to mention the complete list of American works performed by the Conductorless Symphony Orchestra:

Cowell's "Tone Cluster" concerto for piano and orchestra, Ruggles's "Portals," Salzedo's "The Enchanted Isle" for harp and orchestra, Stillman's "Serenade" and Weiss's scherzo, "American Life."

A LETTER OF APPROVAL.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

PLEASE accept my heartiest congratulations on the excellent article, "Rise of American Composers," in THE TIMES.

I hope that this very comprehensive work will encourage the "leaders in American musical activities" to place compositions of their compatriot composers more and more before the public, and thereby stimulate and create a genuine desire to hear and enjoy these works at every possible opportunity.

JANSSEN'S "NEW YEAR'S EVE"

To the Editor of The New York Times:

IT was nice, after reading the encouraging survey of the American composer's situation with regard to the performance of his compositions by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, to have had the pleasure of hearing van Hoogstraten and the Philharmonic men give Werner Janssen's "New Year's Eve in New York" on the same day. Though I'm sure it was a pure coincidence, I like to think of it as a heroic gesture.

For Janssen's descriptive piece of New York, and particularly Times Square, gone gay and slightly askew on the eve of a new year is a notable reason why more American composers should be encouraged to write—employing native idioms and scenes contemporaneous. The field is rich. And the next decade should see the ranks of the Gershwins, Ruby Blooms, Ferdie Grofes and Janssens considerably augmented.

But as for "New Year's Eve in New York," it is altogether gay and heady music—seeming to have had more than its fill of wine and kisses and sentimental nostalgia, so that it almost "spills" over the listeners and engulfs them with its captivating rhythms and lush harmonies.

I am not concerned as to whether or not Janssen has made an "important" contribution to American music. (As a matter of fact, I'm sure he has). The thing that matters is that here we are confronted with the marvelous spectacle of a young American composer celebrating one of New York's, and for that matter America's, greatest institutions—those precious few minutes just befor the new year starts, when every one's heart begins suddenly, for an unexplainable reason, to flow out of his mouth. And he has captured this trenchantly and with fine feeling and a deep, rich sophistication.

Bravo, Janssen!

BRUCKNER AND MAHLER.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

THERE is no question that the Stadium concerts are a boon to music lovers and an educational institution. The programs are very gratfying thus far, because they include not only standard well known works but novelties as well.

The standard répertoire could be enlarged to a great extent by the addition of the symphonic works of Anton Bruckner and Gustav Mahler, whose music is very popular in Central Europe and almost wholly neglected and misunderstood here. Not so long ago any one who would have prophesied that Wagner would be performed before sold-out houses would have been considered a little unbalanced. Despite this fact, however, Wagner today is known to be a box office attraction. He was opposed along with Bruckner in Europe. He was certainly not beloved here. Yet through the efforts of certain critics and conductors who had the courage to play his music and to explain his message in the face of violent criticisms, Wagner today is one of the most popular of all composers.

The same could be done for Bruckner and Mahler. Mr. van Hoogstraten played Bruckner's Seventh last season, and if he were to play one Bruckner and one Mahler symphony each season, the audiences would gradually become familiar with their works and could not help but admire the divine and romantic beauties of these masters. This end could be attained more easily if Mr. van Hoogstraten would give a short explanation before playing an unfamiliar symphony. Such an explanation would render the program notes even more helpful to the layman, and the repetition of this music from one season to another would without doubt make Bruckner and Mahler extremely popular here, as they have become abroad.

LEOPOLD AUER, MAN AND ARTIST

The Passing of a Great Violinist and Teacher—Impressively Long And Versatile Life—Conductor, Editor and Writer

A FEW days ago word was received from Dresden that Leopold Auer, great man and artist, had passed on. To most the name meant principally that of a supremely great teacher of the violin. To those who had the rare fortune to study under him it meant the loss of a great and inspiring counselor. To his circle of intimates it meant the loss, in a physical sense, of a great man and friend. Of his innumerable gracious kindnesses it is gratuitous to speak here and now, and he would have been greatly embarrassed to have them bruited about. These, no less than his impressive record in various fields of music, will remain in the memory of men and women who are stirred by greatness in art and living.

When he was more than 75 years old, this giant sat down and put on paper his memoirs. According to his own testimony, though the flowing and delightfully anecdotal style of the story makes his avowal seem incongruous, he was one of those artists who wished nothing less than to write. "For years," he tells us in his "My Long Life in Music" (Frederick A. Stokes Company, New York), "I have been intending to write my musical biography. Yet on each occasion an innate aversion to writing in general would lead me to take advantage of every trifling external reason which might justify my laying aside what I had commenced." Is it not extremely significant that he wrote his autobiography when approaching 80, only after he had come to a new country, America, where he also wrote most of his teaching works and transcriptions? Was it merely the change and new contacts, or was it not rather the invigoration of a more energetic civilization and a more youthful country?

THE reader beholds the magnificent spectacle of a man nearly fourscore leaving the land where he had so long been a commanding figure, fleeing the bedlam of revolution, to start life anew in a far-off and totally strange and new land. The writer traces his life from the little town of Vesprem, Hungary, the land of violinists, where he was born on June 7, 1845, the son of an artistic house painter and interior decorator. He tells of his first miniature fiddle at 6, his brilliant student days in Paris, his privileged study under the great Joachim, his playing with Brahms, his concertmastership at 19 at Düsseldorf, his journeys as soloist and with chamber ensembles, his tour with Patti, his friendship with the Russian "Five," his London season in 1871. We read of his meeting with Paderewski and scores of figures adorning international music and politics, his conducting of the Russian Musical Society Orchestra.

The kaleidoscope revolves. He is appointed soloist at the Russia court. He plays at coronations, and contrasts the pomp and circumstance and the stultifying and wasteful display of wealth with the exhausted and hungry soldiers forced inhumanly to await the Czar's arrival before they are granted permission to eat a few morsels of food. Auer's heart never left him, and such characteristic touches abound in the story.

He tours the Balkan capitals, and is received at the court of Sultan Abdul Hamid II, who insists that he continue playing though his strings have stretched and his violin is terribly out of tune. He tells us of "great violin talents": Zimbalist, Heifetz, Elman, Seidel. Then come his last years in Russia.

HE knew not merely the great musicians of his time—the Rubinsteins, Sarasate, Wieniawski, Rossini, the Strausses, kings of the waltz—but also the court of Napoleon III, those of Russia, the London home frequented by Gladstone, Disraeli and Edward VII. The account is a panorama of the personages and events of the international artistic life of the many decades he himself adorned.

The son of the house painter born in the little Hungarian town in 1845 had gone a long way. In his eighty-five years of earthly stay he had seen and done many interesting and big things. The climb had indeed been long, but it had been sure. The little Hungarian boy had lived to be court soloist under three Russian Emperors. He had received many decorations—the French Legion of Honor, the Grand Cross of the Order of St. Stanislas, shared only by Vassili Safonoff, the director of the Imperial Conservatory of Music in Moscow, and Edouard Napravnik, the first conductor of the Imperial Opera in Petrograd. He valued none so highly as the little Meiningen cross which he received in 1908 from Czar Nicholas II on the occasion of his forty-year jubilee in the service of the Petrograd Conservatory. Comparable, perhaps, to it in his mind was another event, the gala concert given in his honor at Carnegie Hall on April 28, 1925, on his eightieth birthday, by Jascha Heifetz, Efrem Zimbalist, Josef Hofmann, Ossip Gabrilowitsch and Sergei Rachmaninoff. The following year he became an American citizen.

As we scan musical history, the number of great instrumentalists and singers is comparatively large. How many of them have left such a heritage of pupils to carry on? Only a few names stand out in high relief: Garcia, Marchesi, Liszt, Leschetizky. What would such a teacher have meant to the world in musical composition or in conducting? It is true that no teacher, no matter how endowed, can work without greatly gifted pupils. On the other hand, it is little short of astounding how some teachers find and develop this raw material. A genius, it is irrefutable, must be first born, but it is almost equally necessary that he then be made by the proper guidance and be allowed to grow in the proper environment. It has been one of the great tragedies of music, and for that matter of all the arts, that uncounted geniuses have been crushed by lack of these propitious requisites and have been allowed to lie neglected, dormant and fallow.

To many, the most amazing facet of Auer's uncanny ability to develop great interpreters has been that, though each of his pupils shows unmistakably the sign of the master, each is nevertheless wholly individual and absolutely unlike any other. What hearer, though he be merely a music lover and no professional violinist, upon hearing a dozen of the famous pupils of the master from another room, could possibly mistake one for the other? Yet the reserved, lofty and classic art of Zimbalist, the glowing tone of Elman, the fiery romanticism of Seidel and the truly marvelous technical virtuosity of Heifetz all came from the same crucible. On violinists of the most diverse traditions and national backgrounds he brought his own magic to bear, and then sent them out into the world more than ever individuals, yet just as undeniably Auer products.

LONG before the days of feminism he accepted women pupils as well as men. From his fold came Kathleen Parlow, Isolde Menges, Maia Bang, Ruth Ray, Thelma Given, Cecilia Hansen (who was hounded by some of the boys in the class), Margaret Sittig, Ilse Niemack and Sophia Jaffé, the feminine Sarasate, who had to dress as a boy to study at the Paris Conservatory.

His influence in this country was tremendous, for hundreds of Americans came under his direct guidance at the Institute of Musical Art in New York, the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia and in other cities. It is noteworthy that a large number of his pupils appear here frequently in concert or have elected to stay here permanently. To the galaxy already noted may be added Richard Burgin (the concertmaster of the Boston Symphony), Eddy Brown, Francis Macmillen, Michel Piastro, Max Rosen, Josef Borisoff, Josef Achron, Samuel Dushkin, Henry Farbman, Miron Poliakine, Alexander Bloch, David Hochstein (who met a heroic death in the World War), Victor Küzdo, Jaroslav Siskovsky, Roderick White and Paul Stassévitch (also a virtuoso pianist). To have produced such a staggering list of famous virtuosi presupposes a great gift for practical and theoretical psychology.

Could any "method" have been responsible for such results? Hardly. Auer used every method and idea that came to his knowledge. All was grist for his mill. If we make "method" plural, and say "methods," we begin to understand the power of the man. In his two works, "Violin Playing as I Teach It" (Frederick A. Stokes, New York) and "Violin Master Works and Their Interpretation" (Carl Fischer, New York), students, teachers and violinists—and we may add concertgoers also—have before them pages of the utmost value. They constitute, indeed, a heritage, for they tell us, in the master's own words, now that he is no longer with us, his methods, quite a different thing from his "method." Each left and right hand he treats as a new physiological problem, each brain as a new psychological entity. And like a great and true physician, he prescribes different exercise and nourishment for each case.

THE opening words in his "Violin Playing as I Teach It" tells us modestly that "in publishing this book on the art of violin playing I should scarcely presume to lay claim for having made any novel discoveries with regard to the subject in question." After a characteristic tribute to pioneer pedagogues, he points out the true reason for his own greatness as a teacher. "They have extended the theory of violin playing to include a careful analysis of the physical elements of their art, treating their subject from a physical point of view * * * yet the most essential factor * * * has hitherto been largely overlooked. This factor is the mental one. And yet, unless one is capable of hard mental labor and prolonged concentration, it is a waste of time to undertake the complicated task of mastering an instrument as difficult as the violin." If the presumption be condoned of attempting to concentrate in a few sentences what the master speaks of as "well-nigh sixty years of experience * * * verified by experiment and observation," these few quoted phrases seem to stand out as typical as any. In these days of get-famous-quick, how refreshing it is to come upon a man who, though long recognized as standing at the height of his art, yet waits until he has verified, observed, studied, played, experimented and experienced for nearly threescore and fifteen years before he feels himself qualified to present his conclusions to others!

To those of us who are fascinated by the endless problems of violin technic his book is a precious companion. There is no condescension, no patronage. The writer converses with us through the usually forbidding confines of the printed page as a colleague. He tells us how he himself studied the violin. He speaks to his student as if he too were a fellow-student. And so it was in all his personal teaching.

Some chapters are naturally of especial delight to the inveterate addict of fiddle problems. We are told all sorts of tricks to overcome natural handicaps, to perform feathery staccato and springing and flying bowings, how to produce a living tone, an exquisite vibrato, a shimmering glissando and many other feats we have heard his pupils perform with such notable virtuosity. His comments upon flageolet tones and plucked notes with either hand are precious. True to his gospel, however, he gives proportionate space to nuance, phrasing, portamento, style, nerves and interpretation. Certainly this is a formidable amount of quantity and quality to compress within one volume, and yet he does it with rare success.

HIS genius for advising each pupil what to play in public was phenomenal, and it is safe to say that many successes were due to this faculty. In his "Violin Master Works and Their Interpretation" we have once more the concentrated results of almost seventy years of observation and study. Here he analyzes a panorama of the violinist's chrestomathy, from the Italian classics through the great solos of Bach to the modern repertory. It is all food for not merely the violinist alone but also for the lover of the instrument and the concertgoer.

In the field of transcription he was outstanding and, with Fritz Kreisler, set a new standard in felicity and idiomatic transformation of material culled from diverse sources. Some of these arrangements may almost be considered original works. From a long list a few may be cited: "The Turkish March" and "The Chorus of the Dervishes," from Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens"; the two cadenzas for the Beethoven violin concerto; the "Andante Cantabile" from the Tchaikovsky string quartet; the "Air de Lensky," from the same composer's "Eugene Onégin"; the Fantasie on Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Russian Airs"; the "Heart of Harlequin" and "Valse Bluette" of Drigo's, "The Lark" of Glinka's, Schumann's "Dedication" and Wagner's "Dreams."

His teaching and the writing of these works were only part of his immense activities. He found time to write an eight-volume "Graded Course of Violin Playing," four supplementary volumes on ensemble playing, and edited dozens of standard concertos, sonatas and lighter pieces.

All this, it will bear repeating, was done by a man who had passed his allotted threescore years and ten.

It was one of the penalties of an unusually ramified life such as his that his career as a conductor, in which he had no small measure of success, was forced more or less into the background. It can only be conjectured what he might have done in this field if he had devoted all his time and gifts to it.

HE conducted as guest of Hans von Bülow, and followed his host in directing without score. The apprehension of auditors and players, which were soon proved groundless, recalls the frantic objections which greeted Spohr in the early nineteenth century when he appeared before the London Philharmonic without a baton. On many occasions he conducted the orchestral accompaniments for his pupils.

Throughout his autobiography we see that he has his weather-eye always upon conductors. His delightfully droll anecdote about the irrepressible and independent von Bülow regales us. We read dozens of famous names, "Jan Mengelberg, director of the Concertgebouw Orchestra in Amsterdam"; Felix Weingartner, Richard Strauss, Vassili Safonoff, Felix Mottl, the Strauss waltz kings, and many, many others. His keen comment upon the poor conducting of Anton Rubinstein is as illuminating as is his verdict on the greatness of von Bülow.

It is a historic delusion that genius dies young. Here is an example to the contrary, bolstered up by a Wagner of 70, a Verdi of 88, a Saint-Saëns of 86 and others. When Auer left us, his mind was as keen as ever.

It is an age-long issue whether conditions create the man or the man the conditions. Is it not pertinent to ask whether Russia would have had such a galaxy headed by Zimbalist, Heifetz, Seidel and Elman without an Auer? Is it not equally pertinent to inquire whether France, Belgium, Italy or the United States would not have had it if Auer had come to one of these countries as a young man?

The impersonal restraint and utter absence of bitterness in his autobiography and in his daily speech constituted one of the great charms of the man.

Of the many sides of this gifted artist and man it is patently impossible to speak except at great length. He will be remembered for many things by his pupils, by his friends and by the great world-circle of music lovers. It is the fashion to regret the passing of great figures, and though this is human and understandable, should we not be grateful that we had such a man with us so long? That he lived meant much to his time and his art.

BENJAMIN GROSBAYNE.

THE DANCE: A CHAOTIC EFFORT

The "Totenmal," Given Without Due Preparation, Offers a Jumble of Episodes—Mary Wigman's Handicaps

By JOHN MARTIN.

MUNICH.

BY the time these words appear in print the "Totenmal"—the great memorial performance to the war dead of all nations—in which Mary Wigman is the outstanding figure, should have received its belated first public appearance, if no new disasters have arisen in the meantime to require its further postponement. According to the original plans of the Chorische Bühne of Munich, under whose auspices it is being given throughout the Summer, the première was originally set for June 20; and the second performance, four days later, was to have been for the members of the German Dance Congress then in session.

Neither of these performances took place. The first was abandoned entirely. The second would have been postponed if Mary Wigman had had her way, for she realized the utter hopelessness of trying to present a theatrical production not only of major proportions but of an experimental character when it was in every way unready.

Contracts being contracts, however, and "Totelmal" being an advertised item on the program of the dance congress, Frau Wigman was instructed either to show something at the scheduled time or assume the liability for any damages that might accrue from the violation of duly signed legal obligations, parties to the contract being the city of Munich, the Chorische Bühne and several dancers' unions. Frau Wigman, faced with a choice of the famous Hobson variety, consented that "something" should be shown. Consequently, the dance congress assembled on the appointed evening in Festspielhalle VII in the Austellungspark to enjoy a fragmentary glimpse of the much talked of work.

Those in this first audience who may feel cheated, however, may find a vindictive sort of consolation in the knowledge that no one is likely ever to see the "Totenmal" in a finished state. At present the most vivid picture of the real substance and fiber of the production is to be obtained from hearing Mary Wigman talk about what she had hoped to do and not from anything that takes place on the stage. In even her casual conversation on the subject there springs to life again the flame of her first creative impulse, which has had to suffer too much for it to preserve more than an echo of its native vitality in the process of materialization.

THE efforts of "Totenmal" producers to achieve an esthetic form in which to corporealize its idealism are definitely a failure. The history of the affair is, briefly, as follows: When Albert Talhoff, the Swiss poet, brought his poem and his ideas for production to Mary Wigman she was deeply interested. From time to time her cooperation had previously been sought in enterprises such as this, having as their object the combination of the spoken word and the dance in a theatrical synthesis; but she had never felt sufficiently impelled by the intrinsic worth of any of the works submitted to her to embark on so precarious an esthetic adventure. Talhoff's poem, however, seemed to her to justify any effort she might expend; her only fear was its excessive demands upon the resources of the theatre. With a poet's abandon, the author had given little heed to the practical aspects of stagecraft, his dream being concerned only with artistic synthesis.

One scene in particular gave rise to serious question in the mind of Mary Wigman. The nature of the poem is mystical. It is, in effect, a lament for the living rather than the dead, making the tragedy of war centre in the separation of loved ones from each other. It cannot be said to have a plot in any sense of the word, but if it has any leading theme of action it is the struggle to break down the barriers between the war's survivors and those who have been torn from them by death.

Wigman is seen throughout the maimed scenes as a symbolic figure who embraces the qualities of vision, bravery and leadership—a transcendent symbol of woman as the pure lover. While her fellows succumb in pitiful inadequacy to their grief and despair, she rises to action and even stirs them at times to follow. The difference between her and the others is excellently heightened by the fact that she alone appears without a mask, and the eloquent play of her face is in fine contrast with the mute eloquence of beautifully designed masks.

BUT the third of the dancers' scenes caused the doubt in Wigman's mind. Here she was to appear alone in a mighty struggle with mystical forces. In the previous scene she had found, among the dead, one who presented to her the symbol of a greatly loved one. The relationship was not a romantic one, for neither the figure of the woman herself nor that of the man whom she sought was a realistic figure. As she typified the great impersonality of woman's love, he became similarly a heroic conception of the object of that love. Having found him, she determined to destroy the barriers that stood between them—the living and the dead.

These barriers, according to the author's idea, were to be represented visibly by light, but the manner of their practical realization was, of course, completely out of his scope. Until she could be sure that this scene could be achieved on the stage, Wigman refused to undertake the production, for this was the crucial episode of the entire work.

Accordingly, one of the most distinguished experts on stage lighting was called in consultation. This was Professor Adolf Linnebach, who, besides being in charge of the lighting of the Bavarian State theatres, is a man of world-wide renown in his particular field. When the project was laid before him in its entirety, he immediately became enthusiastic. He quieted all of Wigman's fears about the intangible barriers of light against which she was to fight, and even went so far as to outline roughly the method by which the problem was to be worked out. For each of the three barriers which the woman must conquer, one by one, he would drop a curtain of steam upon which light of the proper quality and form would be projected.

Reassured not only by his confidence but also by his real eagerness to assist in the great experiment, Wigman retired to her Dresden studio and set about devising the dances and movement for herself and her group. Linnebach had set a date for the completion of his part of the enterprise, the authorities in Munich had agreed to have one of the great halls in the exhibition park remodeled by a specified time, and Talhoff's verse was put into rehearsal by a chorus of speakers and soloists under the direction of Dr. Karl Vogt of Berlin.

BUT when it came time for all these individual elements to be assembled it became evident that all would not be well with the "Totenmal." In the first place, the building was not ready, and it was utterly impossible to rehearse on the stage. In the second place, Talhoff had engaged his efforts in the assembling of the orchestra of percussion instruments which had been agreed upon, and also in devising an elaborate orchestra score of noises quite different from those which had been agreed upon and on which Mary Wigman had built her whole dance composition. It was necessary for her, without the stage to work on, to remake, modify and patch up her choreography from beginning to end to accord with the author's "music."

This "music," incidentally, proved to be perhaps the greatest affront to the human ear which has yet been offered in the name of art. It is scored for some twenty or more drums of various sizes and kinds; approximately thirty gongs, ranging from a few inches to four or five feet in diameter; a set of chimes; numerous cymbals, triangles and other less easily identifiable means of noise-making, as well as an organ which semi-occasionally made itself heard, chiefly by means of its deepest tones, which were not so much heard as felt.

In composing for this array of instruments Talhoff indulged to the fullest a penchant for fortissimo. One hesitates to think what the result might have been if he had had a riveting machine at his disposal. As it was, during the overture, which lasted approximately fifteen minutes and was apparently intended to be descriptive of the horrors of war, the audience even as far back as the twentieth row of this huge hall began to put their fingers in their ears in the interest of sanity.

But even this relentless din was not the worst disaster. That remained to be inflicted through the instrumentality of Professor Linnebach. At the appointed time his specially designed electrical apparatus failed to arrive, and when, after pressure was brought to bear, it did turn up, it was not at all according to specifications and was utterly useless. Rebuilding meant a long delay, and to attempt to get along without rebuilding meant completely changing the lighting plan. Partly for this reason, perhaps, he abandoned his scheme for projecting light upon curtains of steam and instead tried to substitute curtains of water. This proved not only highly impractical but something less than comfortable for the dancer, as may well be imagined, and Linnebach asked for a few days to devise other methods.

TIME passed, however, and nothing was heard from him, so at last he was sought out. But, alas! he was nowhere to be found. He had suffered a nervous breakdown and had betaken himself to a health resort to recuperate. Presumably he is still there. At any rate, the "Totenmal" remains without benefit of his lighting devices, and the great scene upon which Wigman staked everything is only makeshift.

Her individual performance, though certainly not as fine as it would have been if she had been able to carry it out as she originally conceived it, is beautiful and moving, for she is a rare personality and fills the great spaces of the somber hall to its furthest corner with the consciousness that here is a living, dynamic presence. Her group choreography, likewise, has many extraordinary moments salvaged from the general wreckage, and it is excellently performed by her admirably trained group of dancers. But against the comparatively few minutes of her work (and that not as she planned it) are the seemingly endless spoken choruses of Talhoff's poem, which, whatever its poetic qualities, is merely words when it is put upon the stage. Then, too, there is the din! And there are no intermissions during which to regain one's equilibrium.

Indeed, the great lack which is evident in the production, granting for the moment that it has sufficient stageworthiness to have justified its being produced at all, is that nobody with a director's instinct and a technical knowledge of the theatre was in charge to bring all the diffuse elements into a wholeness of form. Here was no synthesis of movement, light and the spoken word—here was rather a disconnected series of episodes in different mediums, now in recited verse, now in percussion, now in miming and dance. The result is a moving tragedy, to be sure, but one weeps not over the horrors of war but that Mary Wigman's genius should have been so pitifully betrayed.

STADIUM CONCERTS

Guest Conductor for Philharmonic-Symphony—Reed's "Lincoln Imp"

ALBERT COATES, the English conductor, begins a three-week guest engagement at the Lewisohn Stadium tomorrow evening. A program which includes the Dvorak "Carnaval" overture, the prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovantchina," Strauss's "Don Juan" and the "Divine Poem" of Scriabin will be presented by Mr. Coates on the opening night of his third season as guest conductor of the Stadium concerts.

On Tuesday evening W. H. Reed's "The Lincoln Imp," one of the novelties scheduled for presentation at the Stadium this season, will be heard. William Henry Reed, an Englishman, born in 1876, is a well-known composer and violinist. He has been a member of the violin section of the London Symphony Orchestra since its formation in 1904 and became its concertmaster in 1912. Mr. Reed has appeared as soloist and chamber music performer and has also done a considerable amount of conducting. "The Lincoln Imp," written in 1921, was first performed at the festival of the Three Choirs, Hereford, in the same year. The following explanatory note appears on the title page of the score:

"Concerning the Imp of Lincoln Cathedral, there is a legend that when wandering, bent upon mischief, he chanced to fall in with the Northeast Wind, riding upon it until the cathedral was sighted. Desiring to enter, and bidding the Northeast Wind await his return, the Imp proceeded within. Vaulting the benches, he espied the bell-rope; jangled the bells, strummed the organ, tore the vestments to shreds and broke the brazen candlesticks across his knees. Intending to work his crowning mischief upon the altar, he found his way barred by an angel. Putting out his hand to stroke the wonderful shining hair of the angel, he was, for his presumption, immediately turned to stone.

A feature of the current week will be an all-Wagner program on Wednesday and Thursday evenings, with Elsa Alsen, soprano, and Paul Althouse, tenor, as soloists. The Verdi "Requiem," with soloists and chorus, is announced for Tuesday and Wednesday evenings, Aug. 5 and 6.

RECORDED MUSIC: BEETHOVEN

The Fourth Piano Concerto Played by Backhaus in A New Release—The Symphonies of Sibelius

By COMPTON PAKENHAM.

WILHELM BACKHAUS, Sir Landon Ronald and the London Symphony Orchestra have combined with H. M. V. to make a truly remarkable recording of Beethoven's Fourth piano concerto in G (Op. 58). These four records are an example of what experience can do. Ronald was among the earliest conductors to make full length orchestral recordings, and the London Symphony has to its credit as distinguished a list as any of the better known orchestras. Backhaus, also, has been steadily improving in his studio manner and has been issuing a steady stream since he commenced making disks in Switzerland. The result in this case is as well rounded as anything that has come this way.

There is some doubt as to exactly when Beethoven finished the Fourth concerto, but at any rate it was complete by the end of 1806, and its first performance occurred at Prince Lobkowitz's during the following March. It was presented to the public in Vienna, the composer at the piano, in the Winter season of 1808. Which is to say that it belongs to the period of the Fifth symphony—as might be suspected from the opening passages. The principal theme, with its slightly reminiscent flavor, is stated by the soloist, who then retires from the scene, while the full orchestra proceeds with a long development and introduction of subsidiary motives. This constituted an innovation at the time—not the only one introduced by the composer into this concerto.

While it would hardly be correct to say that these mark any definite advance in piano recording, Backhaus's work is reproduced with remarkable clarity. The purling chromatic passages of the first movement (allegro moderato) and the arpeggio accompaniment in the third (rondo vivace) come out with each note distinct in itself. The second movement (andante), a short interlude covering only one side and in the score marked to run straight into the finale is about as flawless a piece of reproduction as the present libraries can show.

The distribution of the set runs: First movement, four sides; second, one side, and third, three sides.

VLADIMIR DE PACHMANN is with us again in his peculiarly own Chopin (Preludes in B minor, Op. 28, No. 6, and G major, Op. 28, No. 3), and the nearest thing to it, Mendelssohn (Prelude in E minor, Ap. 35, No. 1). Here we have the same old lion who has been with us almost as long as the gramophone itself, with the same evidences of caprice and polish and some remarkably beautiful phrasing. But it must be admitted that in places the familiar delicate perfection leaves him, and for this the recording cannot be blamed. One suspects that the shortcomings in tone might be blamed on the piano. The Chopin should be familiar enough, and the reverse carries the happiest possible choice if Mendelssohn was required as a partner. If the disk were not labeled there would be little difficulty in identifying the player, though there are some passages not entirely characteristic. De Pachmann becomes vocal and, before commencing, addresses some remarks in his almost unique manner, words which unfortunately are quite inaudible. This is a re-pressing from H. M. V. issue of last November (Victor 1459).

Another piano record comes from Brunswick, chosen from their large Polydor store. This is Alexander Brailowsky's playing of Scriabin's Prelude (Op. 11, No. 10) and Etude in D flat (Op. 3, No. 12), and De Falla's Ritual Fire Dance from "El Amor Brujo" (90050). Lately Polydor seems to have been working Brailowsky regularly, and in the main the effort is entirely justified. He has a certain dramatic quality which transfers itself admirably to the wax, while his force is very much suited to the present stage of piano recording. Apart from other considerations, the reappearance of Scriabin in the lists is satisfactory. With all that has been going on it would appear that he is entitled to a much larger representation than he has been allowed, and these early pieces, especially the Prelude, show promise of better things to come.

FLUTE records worth listening to are a rarity, which earns favorable notice from John Amadio, who appears for the first time under an American seal with Doppler's Hungarian Pastoral Fantasy and an arrangement of the Carnival of Venice (Victor 9695). A regular H. M. V. artist, Amadio is known on this side only through his occasional appearances when he has assisted his wife, Florence Austral. His previous records, imported, show better effects than this. The banal flights of the Carnival are hardly suited to one who is at his best in the lower register and a more placid mood. This seems to be another case of re-pressing the first record at hand instead of introducing a new name to the catalogue after a little consideration for the player and the public.

It would seem that one of the indoor sports with which the occupants of recording studios while away rainy afternoons is playing "Finlandia." To those who are content to accumulate their musical knowledge through the publication of the various companies, Sibelius is a one-piece composer. There have been a few adventures as far away from his national symphonic poem as the "Valse Triste," but even this has had scant notice. It seems to have annoyed a number of this department's correspondents. There are constant inquiries as to where recordings of Sibelius's symphonies, particularly the Second and Fourth, are to be obtained. Until now there has been no possible answer.

Now Sibelius, perhaps unfortunately, is not without considerable honor in his country. Under official encouragement his birthdays are celebrated with his own songs and dances, and while still alive he has been given a place in national symbolic portraiture. Not content, however, with confining themselves with mere outward forms of recognition, the members of the Finnish Government have decided to see to the filling of the blanks in record catalogues themselves. The Columbia Gramophone Company, Ltd. (London), has been approached and arrangements, including a substantial contribution toward expenses, have been made for the recording of the symphonies. The original idea was that these should be directed by the composer himself, but Sibelius preferred to be allowed to nominate a conductor and has selected Robert Kajanus, leader of the Finnish Philharmonic Orchestra for nearly forty years, for the task. "Very many men," said Sibelius, "have conducted these symphonies, but there is none who has gone deeper or given them more feeling or beauty than Professor Robert Kajanus."

An amusing side to this is that a few months ago the same government which has now stepped out [illegible] the first to recognize the gramophone in a definite attempt to pr[illegible] the work of one of its national composers was complaining that o[illegible] articles being smuggled into the country, records easily headed the list. Showing one result of a prohibitive tariff.

APPARENTLY the number of fibre needle experimenters is increasing considerably, and in the present state of affairs this is as it should be. So much excellent material is being run off the presses that one does not want to consider replacing ruined disks. However, some of the attempts to get good fiber results seem to have been unsuccessful, and perhaps attention to one or two points will assist in this matter. The present season is not the best for fibres. Heat, particularly damp heat, has a most unfortunate affect on the sharp extremities, encouraging them to collapse long before they have done their duty. In cold dry weather they are at their best.

Then, again, it may be found that considerable improvement will result from reclipping the ordinary wooden fibre in vogue at present, so that the tip rests in the groove in the reverse way to which it is evidently intended it should. Inspection of a point will show the logic of this. The sheath covering the bamboo is the stronger part of the wood. At present the needles are designed so that this runs on the inner side of the groove, where, as the bulk of the pressure and wear attacks it from the outside as the sound box is forced toward the centre, it carries the lighter part of the load. By inserting the needle in the cutter so as to have the sheath side to the left, and clipping until a new point is formed, much better results can be obtained.

The latest in the matter of fibres is a South African development by which a use has at last been found for that terror of the veldt farmers, the prickly pear. The spikes of these otherwise useless vegetables are subjected to a patent process and impregnated with some secret preparation, with the result that an entirely scratchless and quite reliable gramophone needle is produced.

AMERICAN MUSIC NOTES

DAVID W. GUION, American composer-pianist, is appearing at the Roxy Theatre this week as soloist with the Roxy Symphony Orchestra, assisted by the Roxy Male Chorus. Mr. Guion, who is making his first appearance in a motion picture theatre, plays a group of his own compositions representative of various types of American folk-music. A native of Texas, he has composed and arranged many well-known cowboy and prairie songs, such as "Arkansas Traveler," "Home on the Range," "Cowboy's Meditation" and a concert transcription of "Turkey in the Straw."

The Manhattan Opera Company announces that the first performance of a planned series of open-air "dollar opera" presentations in the various baseball parks throughout the East will be given Saturday evening at the Polo Grounds. The opera presented will be Verdi's "Aïda," and subsequent performances have been announced to take place in Hartford, Boston, Montreal, Chicago, Providence and other cities.

The principal singers scheduled to appear in this production are Giovanni Chiaia, Anna Lissetskaya, Lydia Van Gilder, Edoardo Albano and Nino Ruisi. Pasquale Rescigno will conduct and Lunia Nestor will dance.

The Cincinnati Zoo Opera Company will present a revival of Mascagni's opera "Iris" tomorrow evening with Hizi Koyke, Japanese soprano, in the title rôle. Miss Koyke has also been engaged to sing this rôle with the Philadelphia Grand Opera Company when the opera is given in that city next season.

A prize of $100 has been awarded to Dudley Peele of Baltimore, Md., by the Swift & Co. Male Chorus for the best musical setting to the poem "The Italian Serenade," by Percy Bysshe Shelley. This is the tenth annual prize song contest held by the organization, and the prize winning contribution will be sung by the chorus at its Orchestra Hall concert.

Richard Bonelli, now vacationing in Europe, will return to America for a transcontinental concert tour before joining the Chicago Civic Opera Company next season.

Bernardino Molinari recently conducted the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra in the first of a series of ten weekly Tuesday evening concerts of the fifth season of Summer symphony at the Civic Auditorium, San Francisco. The program consisted of Mozart's "Don Giovanni" overture; Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony; Dukas's "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" and Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

Mr. Molinari will conduct the second concert of the series, to be followed by Gaetano Merola, Artur Rodzinski, Willem van Hoogstraten (who is now conducting the New York Stadium concerts), E. Fernandez Arbos, Antonio Brico and Alfred Hertz.

Hermann Abendroth, Hans Knapertsbusch, Richard Strauss and Bruno Walter are on the roster for next season as conductors of the Verein Wiener Tonkünstler concerts. The Sunday afternoon concerts, so popular a feature in Viennese musical life, will be conducted by Hugo Gottesmann and Paul Kerby.

John Charles Thomas, baritone of the Philadelphia Grand Opera Company, is appearing as guest artist at the opera in Brussels. He will be heard with the Philadelphia company next season in "Hamlet."

Arnold Bax's Second symphony was recently given its first London performance at Queen's Hall by Eugene Goossens and his orchestra. The program also included Brahms's Academic Festival Overture, de Falla's "The Three-Cornered Hat" and Vincent d'Indy's "Istar."

The three-act opera "Madeleine Guimard," the text by Lily Braun, the music by the late Karl Prohaska, was given its first performance a short time ago in Breslau. The book deals "with the pathetic life of the great French character-dancer of the eighteenth century." The widow of the composer was present, and the reception was warm.

The Free Open Air Grand Opera Company will give a performance of "Carmen" at the Starlight Stadium Thursday evening with the following cast: Carmen, Zara Jay; Don José, Fernando Bertini; Escamillo, Mario Valle; Micaela, Alba Novella; Zuniga, Amund Sjovik. Michael Feveisky will conduct.

The fourth of a series of free Sunday afternoon organ recitals at the Westchester County Centre, White Plains, will be given this afternoon by E. Arne Hovdesvan of Mercersburg Academy, Mercersburg, Pa.

PRINTS OF DISTINCTION

Artists Consider the Decorative Value of Their Designs in Black and White Work

By ELISABETH LUTHER CARY.

THE exhibition of block prints to be seen until October at the Brooklyn Museum is well worth the attention of all who are interested in the graphic arts. In itself it is varied and of high general quality, and it shows among other things the tendency of modern taste toward dark and light seen in masses as opposed to linear problems. This tendency is more revealing than would seem at first glance. It is direct testimony to the increasing conviction that art should not be stowed away in solander boxes or hung ineffectively among surroundings overpowering it, but should be seen and used as part of a considered scheme of decoration. Such prints as are shown in this exhibition would make each an emphatic decorative note if hung with reference to a decorative whole, and it is a fair guess that most of those securing purchasers will be hung in that way.

The more salient arrangements of dark and light include Angelo Pinto's pictures of the stage, in which bold use has been made of the spotlight, forming an arresting pattern with the areas of intense illumination poured torrentially into black shadow; Howard Cook's "Central Park South," an affair of setbacks and slanting planes; Laura F. Sacket's "Factory Town," patches of light and a ribbon of water; Edward Warwick's "Danger," a tangled thicket in which a family of deer have just discovered a huge black-spotted python darting at them from its point of vantage in a tree; I. Freedlander's "The Last Journey," a hearse climbing a difficult hill, a long stream of the lame and halt following, and throughout the plate a communicated sense of turbulent motion and terrible effort toward arrival at—nothingness.

OTHER plates in which the interest is shared quite evenly between subject and treatment are Katherine Schlater's "The Circus," in which the big areas of black and white are well organized in a close relationship of design, but which certainly would lose much of its entertaining quality if the characters of the circus forming the elements of the design were less cleverly portrayed in their likeness as we know them; John Hibbert's "The Chanticleer," with the raggedness of the bird carried amusingly through its environment, pierced, one seems to hear, by a voice shriller than any Golden Cock who has sung the part on the operatic stage; Wanda Gag's "Cats at Window," in which mellow startling blacks are enriched by the feline curiosity this artist has so many times shown as to make it now a spontaneous evocation.

In certain prints—Todros Geller's "Homeward Bound" with its buildings that topple and its goat that alone withstands; Helen West Heller's "Wheeled Chair"; Leo J. Meissner's beautiful "Summer," the nude figure of a young girl looking from a window at the swelling life and abundance of the fields; Edward Warwick's stylized "Isault"; others—the subject interest gets somewhat the better of the method even where the method is used with as much mastery as in the "Summer."

Abstractions are limited to one example, Helen M. Berry's "Effort," which in its spiral movement hints at the famous Japanese studies of the carp leaping against the waterfall. A number of prints, however, compromise with abstraction; as in H. Glintenkamp's "Machine Made Man," keeping up the march started by Burliuk; Pauline B. Blake's "North Dakota," a most unwinsome place under a sky as bravely angular as one of cubist extraction, and Virginia Armitage McCall's "Illustration," in which a trudging laborer with three outlines presses forward into a landscape splintered with lines of light.

The prize-winning print and two that are given honorable mention differ each from the others in style, manner of execution and emotional content. The one taking the Mildred Boericke Prize for the best print in the exhibition reflects an extremely austere and aristocratic taste on the part of the jury. The artist, Thomas W. Nason, has a thoroughly established reputation for dignified simplicity of effect and an orderly and logical statement of his subject. Nothing we have seen hitherto has been, however, so eloquent in restraint, so clean and delicate in execution, so composed in mood as this small print, "Farm Buildings," which wears its honors as a nun her coif. First honorable mention is given to Charles R. Gardner for "Willows—Rittenhouse Town," a very handsome dark little print, filled with night shadows and moonlight, the clouds in the lower sky curiously illumined, the whole mysterious and subtle as Mr. Nason's print is open and direct. Second honorable mention goes to Leo J. Meissner for "Sundown" in which the same gentle clarity and pensive feeling are present as in his "Summer."

VISITORS from out of town who make it a point to see the new set-back "skyscrapers," which never before have come so close to sweeping away the clouds, make a great mistake if they do not push further and see something of the interiors. Decoration, long withheld, has come in with a rush during the past six months. The latest "opening" of what may come to be called vestibule art took place a few days ago in the News Building which lifts its clean lines heavenward in opposition to the more romantic silhouettes of Tudor City.

It is quite outside the powers of the present writer to give any adequate description of this extraordinary vestibule or even of its principal feature, the enormous globe designed and carried out by Putnam Brinley and his two assistants, Hugh Troy and Gertrude Wiza. Compounded of science and accurate art, it is difficult to realize this globe as the work of the whimsical painter whose delight it was a few years ago to create little climbing hill towns or imagined scenes of village life, teeming with objects the models for which existed only in his versatile brain. In contrast with these singularly lovable designs, his work in the News vestibule conveys a sense of power and mystery overwhelming to even the least sensitive mind, as must have been convincingly proved on the opening day to any one present in the motley city crowd hushed to a strange silence while they watched the slow movement of this great effigy of our familiar mother earth. For that moment, if never before, each individual experienced the unearthly apprehension supremely expressed in Prospero's famous words to Ferdinand:

> "Like the baseless fabric of this vision,
> The cloud-capp'd towers, the gorgeous palaces,
> The solemn temples, the great globe itself,
> Yea, all which it inhabit, shall dissolve
> And, like this insubstantial pageant faded,
> Leave not a wrack behind. We are such stuff
> As dreams are made on, and our little life
> Is rounded with a sleep."

This effect, almost unknown even in our city of white and black magic, is due in part, in no small part, to the lighting of an interior impressive enough in the light of common day.

The color also plays its important rôle in creating the spell exercised by this majestic decoration, color raised to a high key and faintly pallid, suggesting moonlight. The harmony of the globe, the maps in the panels of the side walls and the architecture of the vestibule is accomplished with the subtlety of a naturally sensitive taste doubled by an exacting standard and rich experience. Nor can it be denied that something is gained by the unexpectedness of discovering in this unpromising region of the city, and in a building dedicated to "news" in synthetic form, a decoration depending for its impressiveness upon the highest type of imagination, the imagination, that is, which fuses the stark facts of time and space with the awe-inspiring mysteries of natural laws and their immutable action.

Should you upon leaving the News Building cross Forty-second Street and make your way toward Lexington Avenue, it would be in order to go into the vestibule of the Chrysler Building for the stimulating contrast of Mr. Trumbull's decoration with that by Mr. Brinley. Here, in place of recorded facts and the learning gained through abstract study, we have the practical employment of man's energy, the sublimation of his physical powers guided by understanding, the building of a newly discovered world of invention, the perfection of the machines inhabiting this world. Much more is given, however, than the practical illustration of the present age. The weaving of the illustrative designs into an intricate and logical whole asks for a quality of thought belonging to the higher reaches of the mind. Nevertheless, the genius of inventing and devising is what sustains the interest we feel in the Chrysler decoration.

CURRENT ART NOTES

A young water-color painter, Traver Wilson, is exhibiting his work at the Barbizon Plaza through July 30. Lloyd Morgan, designer of the new Waldorf Astoria has called the young artist "the greatest water-colorist who ever came from Yale." At Massachusetts Institute of Technology he worked with Jacques Carlu, Ferran and Haffner. With two tuition scholarships he pursued his studies at Yale under Otto Faelton and Lloyd Morgan. Upon his graduation he won the Winchester Scholarship and with it a year's tour of Europe. Wilson at the present time is associated with Laurence Emmons, architect and designer of the Barbizon Plaza. His paintings and sketches of ships and sails, cathedrals and illusive Gothic tracery were done on the Continent and in Africa.

Professor and Mrs. McMahon, with the cooperation of a number of prominent French museum directors and artists, have assembled an exhibition of sixty paintings by the younger French artists for the College Art Association. These paintings will be shown at the Wildenstein Galleries and then will circulate throughout the United States. A group of thirty-five paintings from the present exposition at the Tuilleries will be included. Professor McMahon is chairman of the Department of Fine Arts of New York University and director of the College Art Association. Mrs. McMahon is chairman of the committee on Traveling Exhibitions.

The Fitchburg Art Center is holding a tercentenary exhibition of American painting until Aug. [illegible]. The aim of this exhibition is to present as well as possible, within necessary limits, significant phases that trace the development of American painting during these three hundred years. Prints have been included as well as two pieces of contemporary sculpture.

Recent acquisitions of the Worcester Art Museum are an ivory carving, "The Adoration: the Crucifixion; Christ in Glory," formerly in the Fugger collection and probably dating from the thirteenth century; a stained glass panel, half length figure, from Strasbourg of the twelfth or early thirteenth century, and "The Clown," by Numa Patlagean.

The work of Anthony Thieme is being shown in a special summer exhibition at the Art Center, Perkins Cove, Ogunquit. About thirty-five paintings of harbor scenes, landscapes, Colonial doorways, old mills and moonlit bays are exhibited.

The Summer colony at Ogunquit is holding open forum meetings in the Art Center. A short lecture is delivered by the speaker of the evening and an open discussion from the floor follows. These meetings will continue every Thursday evening during July and August.

A development of the fine arts in the United States which is destined to rival that of ancient Athens and the Florence of Lorenzo, and the first evidences of which are already appearing in modern American architecture, painting and the drama, is predicted by Professor Emerson H. Swift of the Department of Fine Arts, Columbia University, as the result of a survey of educational institutions, civic projects and agencies allied with art activities throughout the country.

Increasing wealth, which is bringing leisure, travel and association with older cultures, is the mainspring of the new "American Renaissance," Professor Swift said. Even the World War served to inspire several millions of Americans with an interest in the art of Europe, although the soldier saw France in an aspect which was "sordid and dispiriting enough at times."

The final impulse to the present movement in this country, Professor Swift finds, is being supplied by the schools and colleges, which are providing widespread and constantly growing facilities for the general public. The result is a national interest in the arts "based upon a secure and lasting foundation closely analogous to those which have supported the great artistic impulses of the past."

London.

Jack Yeats, whose work was recently shown in America, is holding an exhibition at the Alpine Club Gallery in London. The critic of The London Times says concerning his work: "Mr. Yeats habitually paints from a mental condition in which a turn of the head or a gesture of the hand is remembered for the rest of life, and is recalled again without giving up its implications so that they can be put into articulate language. Mr. Yeats turns indifferently from 'Bazaar' or 'Lovers in a Cinema' to such a subject as 'Going to Wolf Tone's Grave,' an extraordinary moving picture of commonplace people in a railway station, in which the whole canvas seems to be weeping. By strictly pictorial standards, probably his best painting is 'Stranger in the Circus,' but 'Power Station,' 'Canal Near Ashton' and 'Canal From the Train' are full of the magic of conditions. There is nobody in the least like Mr. Yeats, and his technical oddities—including raw color—are to be accepted as necessary consequences of his way of doing things."

Stained Glass Window in Monza Exhibition.

NINETEENTH CENTURY CAMOUFLAGED

By EDWARD ALDEN JEWELL.

MILAN.

FIRST you wonder, changing from tram to tram and traveling far out of the city, why they should choose a place so remote as Monza for their decorative art exhibition. Arrived, and passing from room to room for a general survey, you wonder what, were he here today, King Umberto I might think of the transformation that has visited his palace. But by this time, victim of admiration, you understand why the trams, why the long journey, why Monza; and you feel confident that were he suddenly to appear the good late King would cry "Bravo!" Unless, that is, he found himself too amazed to say anything at all.

Thrice these international shows, beginning in 1923, were held at intervals of two years; but after the show of 1927 they decided to allow a longer period for preparation, so the affair is now triennial. It was a wise move. Three years is not too long a period in which to make ready an exhibition designed on such an ambitious scale. Individual excellence aside, what makes the effect of the whole so pleasing—nay, admirable—is the care that has gone into the arrangement of the exhibits. And not all the good intentions in the world could adequately perform a task of this magnitude at short notice.

TWO floors of the palace have been converted into series of modern rooms. It would not do to display contemporary furniture and rugs and glass and ceramics and all the rest against a nineteenth century palace background, so camouflaging has left no nook undisguised. False walls conceal the ornate old ones. False floors (so true, however, in their fidelity to function) have been laid, in large measure once more demonstrating the virtues of linoleum.

Did you not know where you were, that this was until Umberto's death a regularly tenanted palazzo reale, you could hardly guess it to be other than a modern exhibition hall. Given the desired elbow room and congenial divisions of space, the work of installation has been carried out artistically and with thoroughness. It is, on the architectural side, which is meant to include all the details of assembling units, a successful show, well realizing the committee's aim, which was to illustrate, with an eye to mutual advantage, modern decorative units and ensembles as approached from the point of view of a prospective purchasing public.

So far, so good. We shall perhaps have some unkind things to say about this and that ere we have done. But for the manner in which exhibitors have been given a chance there can be nothing but praise. If the point be stressed, it is because of its very great importance—not always appreciated to the full—in the scheme of such exhibitions.

UNFORTUNATELY, foreign participation does not amount to as much as it might. By the way, why is it that the United States so sedulously avoids these opportunities? Repeatedly this Summer one has run up against the sad conspicuous absence. It seems regrettable both because we are not destitute of ideas and because Europe is beginning seriously to ask what the New World can do. The effort involved in shipping over our answer ought to prove not unprofitable; as for the responsibility, that, one cannot but feel, should be with good cheer, even confidently, shouldered. On the other hand, of course, haste in such matters is to be shunned. Nor will impatient proddings get us anywhere. A critic of the drama observed long ago that you can't scold your public into the theatre, however good the play. We must bide our time.

Austria's contribution, though not extensive, is in many respects interesting, thanks particularly to the excellent products of the Wiener Werkstätte. Attractive, too, are the Hungarian rooms, thronged with the bold colors and bizarre patterns of Budapest. Germany makes her chief bid with an impressive array of metal and glass utensils for laboratory and kitchen. Sweden has sent some of her beautiful, familiar glass; production in this instance is restricted to the factories of Orrefors and Nordiska. Denmark, represented by half a score or more of accomplished artisans, offers Copenhagen porcelains, firmly rooted in the past, yet quite capable of adaptation to modern uses. Russia, alas, badly behind hand, is not, even yet, in the receiving line.

Surely France could have mustered a better showing. Most of her strongest names are missing in the catalogue—though one is never reluctant to welcome fresh talent, or talent that has not yet become a household word. But really there seems no very conspicuous freshness in the three rooms devoted to French wares. They contain much that is exquisite in design and workmanship, but little that attests indisputable supremacy. There is, however, one dazzling group: the traveling bags and bulkier luggage, which would seem to leave nothing unsaid in this direction.

Belgium shows a salle de toilette by Robert Decerf, office furniture by Baugniet, a "studio-fumoir" by the architect Adrien Blomme, and several groups of rugs, fabrics and other accessories. Furniture in the Brazil rooms (take it or leave it) is distinguished by a certain largeness appropriate to those vast reaches of the South American Continent. Great Britain appears very self-conscious, rather sheepishly derivative, except in her poster work.

AS a matter of fact, the Italians have nearly the whole of the say at Monza. Their exhibits, filling certain sections of the first floor and all of the second, cover the ground with exemplary completeness. Here it is possible to study the work of Italian craftsmen and artists as applied in all departments of modern living. There are a thousand odd, delightful conceits, attesting an imagination fertile and adventurous; a technique painstakingly developed.

Particularly gratifying is the treatment of wall surfaces. The Italians, with plenty of tradition to fortify their efforts, as we so well know, are proving that mural art has, decidedly, a present; and some of these artists without difficulty persuade one that it has a future as well. Achille Funi, architect and one of the leaders of the Novecentists, has done some charming walls. For instance, his is the atrium, first entered after a visitor has climbed the flight to the second floor. These murals by Signor Funi are intensely Italian, but beyond this they rehearse an idiom of universal artistry, in their color schemes and in a monumental splendor of design.

Generally as effective, if not always so striking, are the adjacent decorations, now robustly amusing, again reticent and delicate, by Alberto Bevilacqua of Palermo, Augusto Cernigoi of Trieste, Gianni Vagnetti of Florence, Raffaeli de Grada of Milan, Giulio Rosso of Rome and Teonisto Deabate and Massimo Quaglino of Turin. These walls very intelligently harmonize with the various types of furnishing for which they were prepared as backgrounds.

MUCH resourceful work in iron and other metals is likewise on display. The Italian ceramics and glass hold one fascinated. Here, as in the murals, or even more satisfyingly, the multiple mood of our age is suggested. Laughter and sobriety and a sort of lyric grace ripple through their inexhaustible turns of fancy. And by way of linking these fragile poems with the long-ago, a room downstairs has been stocked with exquisite antiques. In form and color they could hardly be surpassed and yet it is agreeable to note that the best of the modern work is not disastrously eclipsed.

Combinations of glass and metal in the lighting fixtures are often very ingenious, sometimes arrestingly fine, though in the realm of illumination Italy, like all the other countries, cannot avoid considerable dross.

Lighting fixtures seem to involve peculiar difficulties and it is only natural that much of the experimentation should conduct into blind alleys. A special word of commendation for the displays of lampshades should be inserted. Also it may be mentioned that some of the stained glass windows, those foils for daylight, are tapping fresh sources.

WHEN it comes to furniture, one is impelled to move cautiously. Arrayed against a single chair or table or bed that immediately establishes a sense of "rightness" are scores or hundreds of articles that by no means stimulate conviction. One grows more and more disposed to accept nothing on faith. Nor does this apply alone to the category of Italian furniture. The exhibition sponsors no overwhelming difference between Italian creations and those of other European countries. The tendency is most awfully to overdo; to debauch, through sheer efforts to be "modern," canons of taste and discretion that in essence at least do not fluctuate with the ebb and flow of ideas. Let us not be too sweeping; it is a tendency, not a blanket description of the modern output.

There is somehow observable on every hand in the Italian section a kind of plushy redundance (which has nothing to do with the plush of the Victorians yet that can be quite as deadly). Designers run into almost unbelievable extravagances, defeating nearly always, when they do so, the ends they set out with every good intention to attain.

For one thing, what a bewildering riot of woods! What orgies of grain matching grain to effect mosaics dreadful in their power to confuse and tire the eye! Good inlay work does not seem to sin in this manner. Perhaps it is because the honest artifice of man is so much more reassuring than the artifice man forces (when he does it lavishly, at any rate) upon helpless nature.

Depressed by such a deal of pseudo and overemphasized magnificence, such a relentless round of bizarreries and—may the word decadence be used?—one pauses, grateful and relaxed, before exhibits like the black and red lacquer bedroom (Sala 96) with its ensemble material so subtly coordinated, or like the dining room by Renzo Gori & Co., with its connotation of peasant simplicity; like the harmonious interior by Borsani or (because it courageously goes the step beyond into a sphere to pure fantasy) that of Rigiano and Fusco, done in conjunction with the Roman architect Alfio Fallica and three other collaborators.

The Italian projects for de luxe steamship cabins are novel, sometimes even brilliantly successful, if they be now and then menaced, too, by the same lurking demon of excess that does so much bedeviling hereabouts.

THE fashion salons are cunning indeed in their equipment to conspire with feminine love of luxury (oh, yes, there is quite as much masculine love of the same commodity) and with the countless pretty foibles that nourish les modes. In one of these salons is found an ever so nice little unobtrusive bar; for fittings do make one so thirsty, and watching even models arrayed most divinely in a dernier cri is less arduous if one can meanwhile sip something suavely cool.

Throughout the exhibition rugs and fabrics play a rôle that is seldom forced or extraneous. Many of the new designs are capital, piquant or sturdy, colorful or sober, as the case may be and as use may recommend.

The exhibition restaurant and lounging rooms are done in excellent taste. Out in the palace gardens the visitor discovers two or three fully furnished model houses. One of these, called "La Casa del 'Depolavorista,'" is directly in line with the program of the Fascist Depolavoro Society and, designed by one woman, Luisa Lovarini, demonstrates what Italy proposes to do for the well-being of her workers. If all the Italian workers of the future live in such luxurious quarters as these, they may well hail the utopia as fait accompli!

According to The London Times, "there are several reasons why tempera painting, the subject of a fifty years' retrospective exhibition at the Whitechapel Art Gallery, should be popular in England. It secures purity of color, in a decorative rather than a constructive function; it lends itself remarkably well to the native talent for romantic illustration, it is very permanent, and, even when great merits of design are absent, it supplies the interest of craftsmanship.

SMART ALONE OR TOGETHER

Too Many White Accents on a Black Costume Detract From Its Chic

THERE is no escaping the black and white of the mode. Fortunately, nobody wants to. These hardy perennials have always been favorites with smart women, and many new tricks of using them, either alone or in combination, prevent any hint of monotony. They are the leaders in the evening mode at present and they appear in striking sports, daytime and beach clothes. The white hat is well established as a most effective accent to the black costume. The white lingerie touches that blossomed out on so many black dresses last Spring will be seen in the Fall, too.

Nothing is smarter than black and white, but at the same time nothing is more glaringly uninteresting than black and white carelessly tossed together. Too many white accents, or white distributed in hit-or-miss fashion, can utterly destroy the chic of a potentially distinguished costume. Any woman who goes in for black and white will have to think out these details for herself if she is to achieve the ideal of a costume which looks as though it had not been thought about at all, but two general rules may be of some assistance.

How to Use White

SUPPOSE, for example, that she wishes to assemble a black daytime costume pointed up with white. Then it would be a good idea not to let the white appear in more than two spots. If the dress had a white collar, and a white hat were worn with it, that would count as one spot, since the two would not be separated by any black areas. The other axiom is that it is a mistake to use both black and white in small accessories. Like all good rules, these may be broken occasionally—the point is not to scatter the white touches so indiscriminately that they lose their effect.

The One-Sided Effect

THE daytime frock at the extreme right is of black canton crepe faille and limits its white to a tucked georgette vestee and a touch at the wrists. Sketched below at the right is one of the successes of Lanvin's midseason collection. The white is all the more emphatic because it is used only on one side of the neck line and ties into a casual bow at the shoulder. The coin-dot black georgette ensemble next to it has been selected by a number of discriminating women as an ideal hot weather costume. It is a Patou creation.

But it is at night that black and white really come into their own as king and queen of the mode. Later the new browns will compete with them for daytime honors, and the jewel colors will be evening rivals, but at present they are outstanding. The three evening dresses shown in the centre of the page are good Paris reasons for their popularity. Chanel is responsible for the unusual combination of white mousseline de soie and black lace at the right. In the centre is a Lanvin model of black georgette, its long lines accentuated by stitched tabs. The original sports a cape of brightest scarlet, but conservative Americans are mostly ordering it in all black. Irene Dana designed the queenly white satin frock at the left.

WHITE VOGUE INCLUDES LINGERIE

IT is hardly necessary to state that the white dress, whether for daytime or evening, to be most effective, demands a white foundation. This single fashion fact has served to revive considerable interest in white lingerie and corsets.

For active and spectator sports wear girdles and corselettes are made of white linen, batiste or net. For evening wear corselettes of white satin, white brocade, lace, or net, frequently introducing a dark écru alençon lace in the brassiere, are successfully solving the foundation garment problem for the white dress.

Likewise in lingerie, sheer white fabrics, made of a flat chiffon, or ninon, are not only good with white dresses, but have a particular elegance in themselves when they are combined with a dark écru lace.

For active sports wear, under white shirts and shorts, additional white shirts and shorts of balbriggan, or other very light weight cotton, rayon or woolen undies are available.

With frocks of any one of the numerous tricky off-white colors, the green-whites, blue-whites and pinky-whites, it is a good idea to have one's slip made of the same off-white color. For such colors in dresses, worn over a dead white or a pastel color, easily lose the faint tint that is their distinguishing feature.

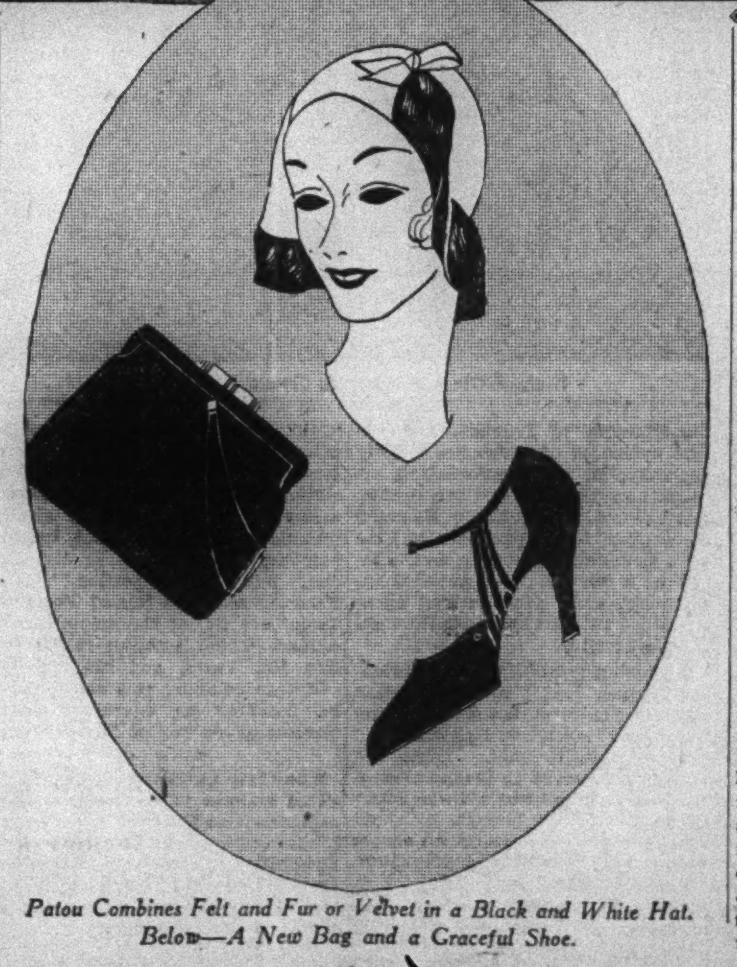
BLACK AND WHITE IN THE HAT MODE

HATS are always one jump ahead of the season. The first straw hats appear before the snow is melted and the population out of its fur coats. In similar fashion the first Fall hats are ready for wear by the middle of Summer.

Not only are they ready for wear in July, but this season they possess commendable adaptability to Summer clothes, which means that a hat bought now may well do service right into Winter. Especially if that hat be either black or white, colors first in fashion significance, it will be as smart later as it is right now. The two are combined in many new models.

Paris is sponsoring white hats with dark clothes for street wear. It is therefore safe to assume that a white velvet beret—a Patou design—may be worn now and also be worn in the Fall with a black or navy sheer woolen dress.

In like manner a black hat of French derivation that will be very chic with a white spectator sports outfit—a black jacket, white dress, black and white sports shoes—will be just as smart later with a black costume or with one of the new dark Fall colors, such as wine red, dark green, deep blue, that are being advanced for coats and dresses.



Patou Combines Felt and Fur or Velvet in a Black and White Hat. Below—A New Bag and a Graceful Shoe.

BLACKS ARE BOTH DULL AND SHINY

THE question is not only whether to wear black, but also whether to wear dull black or shiny black. For black is indubitably top-notch among fashion colors and Paris has its backers for both somber and gleaming versions.

Canton crêpe leads the parade of the dull blacks for dresses, especially among those that the shops are suggesting for the late Summer and early Fall. Every year, it seems, we discover anew the inimitable air of chic and perfect grooming lent by the classically simple black crêpe dress to town and travel costumes. On the bright side of the black picture is satin, destined for evening conquests. Black velvet has its proponents—certainly the panne velvets out-luster satin—but so well established is satin that it is also a likely afternoon candidate.

There are, too, dull and shiny black accessories. Mat kid, antelope, felt and suède offer dull surfaces to hats, bags, shoes or gloves; while patent leather shines in belts, shoes, boutonnières and trimmings on handbags and tweed frocks. Velvet is the shining rival of felt for hats. With the colored costume one may wear either dull or shiny black accessories—with the all-black outfit, a contrast between the two is desirable.

FRENCH RESORT FASHIONS

The White Frock Worn With a Colored Jacket Is Favorite Morning Costume

AS soon as the Grande Semaine has brought the Paris season to its brilliant climax, the style centre shifts seaward. Everybody who is, fashionably speaking, anybody flees for Le Touquet or Deauville, or Antibes or Juan-les-Pins; the capital is occupied by tourists and it is stylistically dead until the big August openings make it again the cynosure of the eyes of the whole world.

At Deauville and Trouville and Le Touquet, now, white predominates over all colors. It looks particularly fresh and attractive in the new wash fabrics, so popular this year—piqué, silk piqué, dimity, organdie and so on. It is worn with colored accessories, particularly bright navy blue, or grenadine red for the daytime, and rich red for evening. Bright yellow is also smart, for sport shoes, scarfs and hats.

Nautical Jackets

THE favorite morning formula is a short sleeved, one piece frock in white and a colored jacket. The hat may match the jacket or it may be white with a matching band. All lengths and shapes of coat are seen. They range from the ultra short, sleeveless, cutaway bolero to the full length redingote; they have shoulder capes, waist length capes, long capes or no capes at all. I note a preference for double-breasted coats and jackets with a slightly seagoing air.

Flannels are popular at the Deauville yacht club. I particularly remarked two of Worth's yachting suits that are made of the flannel specially woven for the famous London Horseguards' uniforms. At Le Touquet some very smart women wore gray flannel suits on one of the cool days with white blouses, hats and gloves.

Trousers are adopted by many feminine yachtsmen. Chantal's white ducks with navy beret and scarf looked marvelously appropriate on a slender disciple of Alain Gerba come ashore for a cocktail at t club the other morning. Anoth wore Jane Regny's navy serge co and white linen frock. America sailors' white hats worn on the ve back of feminine heads are seen o yachts as well as on the beach.

Bathing suits and beach costum of every known variety are see but black, navy blue and white ma the very smartest ones. All whi woolen maillots, high in front, wi a strap around the neck and ver open back are worn by girls wh still go in for sunburn. Wrap-aroun skirts or apron frocks replacing th trousers of beach suits are anothe sign of the success of feminine fashions.

Variety in Hats

THE majority of women are wearing quite large white hats with shallow crowns and brims the same width all around, in panama, bangkok or very rough, large-woven, exotic straw. Felt hats also seem t be returning to favor. For golf they are small; in the afternoon they ar large cloches with the irregula brims sponsored by Patou. I remarked at the Potinière a very smar Parisienne wearing a small cloche o coarse linen with a square crow and linen sandals to match wit wooden heels.

Cardigan suits appear constantl in spite of rumors that they wer outmoded. The jackets are a bi shorter than last year and the skirt a bit longer. Skirts of light materia are pleated rather than circular. These costumes are in shantung, crêpe de chine, light wool or in some one of the new jerseys that hav either an open weave like a lace fishnet or a thick close velvety weav like wool velours. Lots of smart girls like beach clothes in the cotton jersey or linen jersey horizontal weaves launched by Jane Regny.

BLACK AND WHITE ACCESSORIES

WHEN all is said and done, it is really the accessories completing a black and white costume that give it the cool, crisp assurance of perfect grooming. And, from the point of view of one's pocket-book, the beauty of many of these accessories is that they are long-lived, often being as suitable for Fall and Winter as they are now for Summer.

The jewelry, for instance, that one might buy now to wear with black and white outfits would be perfect accompaniments for the black canton Fall dress. Clear crystal beads are being used, with small jet rondels separating them, for necklaces of medium length and afternoon formality. Carved beads of black and white galalith, which are correct now for wear with black and white prints or with sports clothes, will be equally good with the Fall tweeds and wools in black and white mixtures. Crystal, in clear and black versions, is still a Parisian favorite and is certainly most smart with either Fall or Summer black town clothes. Pearls have acquired new chic and are appropriate, Summer or Fall, with black and white costumes.

The black belts which now adorn our black and white printed crêpes and chiffons may be used again with tailored Fall daytime frocks—even those that are red or green. In fact, many of the accessories one chooses for wear now with black and white outfits may be worn with colored Fall ones, thus adding to their scope.

The Southampton Boys' Club, the East Hampton Boys' Club, the Quogue Field Club and the West Hampton Country Club have organized a "South Shore Summer Colony Junior Athletic League," with bi-weekly baseball games scheduled for July and August. David G. Barr is in charge of the Southampton club.

On Monday and Tuesday there will be a round-robin tennis tournament for women at the Meadow Club, with prizes for the winners. The committee in charge is composed of Mrs. Fenton Taylor, Mrs. Edmund S. Twining and Mrs. John T Lawrence. More than twenty entrants will compete, each to play eight matches. A buffet luncheon will be served at the club on each day of play.

Many of the contestants will play in the mixed doubles matches to be held the following week at the Meadow Club, when the forty-seventh annual invitation tennis tournament will take place.

On Tuesday a meeting of the board of directors of the Southampton Fresh Air Home for Crippled Children will be held at the home of the president, Mrs. Goodhue Livingston. The other officers are Mrs. Phillips B. Thompson, vice president; Mrs. George G. Dewitt, secretary, and Mrs. Ernest Wagner, treasurer. The home was established more than twenty-five years ago by the late Mrs. Peter B. Wyckoff. Two years ago proceeds from a carnival held at the Beach Club enabled the organization to enlarge the home to a capacity for forty children, who are cared for during June, July and August.

While it is not planned to have a special benefit affair for the fresh air home this year, the usual rummage sale will be held late in the season. Half of the gate receipts from the flower show will be given to the home and many of the Summer residents are making contributions.

Amounts contributed and pledged during last Summer's drive make it unnecessary this season to hold a benefit for the Southampton Hospital Association. The three largest contributors were Lucien H. Tyng, Colonel Henry H. Rogers and Henry F. du Pont, and all Southampton residents, both Summer and permanent, helped to make possible the new building now under construction.

The third of the Hampton Players' productions, "Doctor X," by Howard W. Comstock and Allen C. Miller, will have its premiere on Wednesday evening at the Parrish Memorial Hall. Special scenic and lighting effects are being devised for this comedy mystery.

An event of the week will be the twenty-third annual exhibition of the Southampton Horticultural Society, to be held in the high school grounds on Thursday and Friday.

Entries for the junior tennis tournaments at the Meadow Club closed on July 23, and play began on July 26.

WATER SPORTS IN ADIRONDACKS

Glider-Boats to Be Tried Out on Lake Champlain; Races for Women Feature Westport Programs

SARANAC INN, N. Y.

FEATURING the aquatic events which usher in August for this season in the Adirondacks and the Champlain Valley are the activities of feminine members of the Summer colony at Lake Placid and elsewhere throughout the region. Women will be participants in the thrilling glider-boat events to be tried out here next week on Lake Champlain to determine the feasibility of incorporating a glider-boat race in the annual regatta of the Westport Yacht Club, which already has been announced for Aug. 17. In this newest form of water sport a special type of glider-boat equipped with wings resembling those of the seaplane is used, the craft obtaining its take-off and altitude as it is drawn at high speed behind a fast power boat.

Young women members of the camp colony on the St. Regis chain of lakes are among the entrants in the sail races scheduled to take place on each Wednesday and Saturday hereafter through the season. Mrs. George H. Townsend of Greenwich, Conn., wife of the former gold cup winner, and daughter, Miss Mary Trowbridge Townsend, are women members of the St. Regis Summer colony at Paul Smith's and annually take part in the St. Regis race events. Mr. Townsend, who has joined his family on the upper St. Regis, will be a contender in the power boat events scheduled for late August on that lake.

Women of the Elizabethtown colony are now interested in arrangements for the first camp wedding of this season in the Adirondacks, which will be an event of Aug. 8, when Miss Katherine McWilliams Ludlum, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. David S. Ludlum of Overbrook, Pa., becomes the bride of Theophilus Heilman Vanneman 3d of Philadelphia and Cambridge, Pa., at Camp Onkobble, the Ludlum Summer place at Elizabethtown.

Announcement was made this week of the annual August championship golf tournament at Saranac Inn to be played on the inn course Aug. 20, 21 and 22.

AT ATLANTIC BEACH

Clambake in an "African Village" Planned for Wednesday Night

ATLANTIC BEACH, L. I.

THE colonists at the Atlantic Beach Club are making elaborate preparations for a clambake which will take place July 30. Under the direction of a committee of prominent society men and the management of Richard Ober Middleton, the beachscape of the new club is being metamorphosed into a South African village. A corps of West Indians is at work preparing the thatched roofs which, between the popular bathing hour and night, will transform the cabins into native huts. Another corps of engineers is at work counterfeiting moonlight. A troupe of Hawaiian dancers are being brought in for the occasion. Dancing will be held on a terrazzo floor on the beach, and a marimba band will play. A midnight swim under artificial moonlight in the Moorish pool will follow the clambake.

At once the most ambitious and informal party of the season, the clambake is attracting wide attention. A number of cottages have been annexed by the club to accommodate the overflow of guests. Dress at the clambake will be informal. Sportswear and elaborate pajamas will be worn by the guests over bathing attire.

Among those who will entertain private parties are Miss Mary Brown Warburton, Mr. and Mrs. Jesse Livermore, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Chrysler, Mr. and Mrs. Byron C. Foy, Mr. and Mrs. Timothy Wells Durant, Dr. and Mrs. William Grosvenor, Mr. and Mrs. David V. Shaw-Kennedy, Mr. and Mrs. Esmond P. O'Brien, Jules Glaenzer, Stanley G. Mortimer, Austen Gray, Mr. and Mrs. Condé Nast, Francis W. Crowninshield, Ludlow W. Stevens, who will entertain a party of débutantes and Junior League members; Anna Case, Mrs. Inman Brokaw, Bertram de N. Cruger, Count Aurelio Baldeschi Balleani, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Johnson, Mr. and Mrs. Grover Whalen, George P. Marshall, Andrew Kakoyannis, William Rhinelander Stewart Jr., Rudolph Spreckles, Mr. and Mrs. L. Stuart Wing and Bryce Wing.

VINEYARD HAVEN FETES YACHTS

EDGARTOWN, Mass.

VINEYARD HAVEN'S interest in the approaching visit of the New York Yacht Club, which is scheduled to race into the harbor on Aug. 6, can well be imagined when it is realized that in the period from 1870 to 1920 it was one of the three yachting ports to be visited by all the defenders of the America's Cup and the aspirants to that honor preceding the thirteen matches sailed in that time. The four yachts now contending for the right to sail against the Shamrock V will be following the lead of their famous predecessors.

This year, in the absence of Commodore John Hoar of the Vineyard Haven Yacht Club, Acting Commodore Frank M. Rhodes and his officers are planning to keep open house at the club's headquarters in Tisbury. The local fleet will dress ship in honor of the visiting yachts and will be gaily illuminated at night. A dance will be given at the clubhouse, which, as well as the pier, will be strung with colored lights. A number of private dinners and dances also are planned.

Although the Edgartown Yacht Club is deeply interested in the visit of the fleet, plans for its own regatta, which will be held Saturday, Aug. 2, are paramount just now. Although the number of clubs which have signified their intention of entering the regatta probably will be augmented in the next few days, definite acceptances have been received from Vineyard Haven, Nantucket, Wianno, Waquoit and Cotuit. Special interest is attached to the two handicap classes, one for schooners and ketches, the other for yawls and sloops.

There will be a dance at the clubhouse the night before the regatta. Visiting teams will be entertained at the homes of the members of the club. On Sunday morning, Aug. 3, the Vineyard Sound interclub classes of the Edgartown and Vineyard Haven Clubs will race, the club winning in that event to race against Nantucket in the afternoon. Vineyard Haven has perfected plans for an important event to be held for the benefit of the Martha's Vineyard Hospital. This will take the form of a silver tea and will be held at Mohu, the Lambert's Cove estate of former Senator William M. Butler.

Tomorrow afternoon the annual pilgrimage of the Martha's Vineyard Garden Club will lead its members to the homes of Mrs. Robert L. Bigelow, Mrs. Willard C. Jackson and Mrs. Frank F. Frederick in Vineyard Haven, Mrs. Walter M. Bennet in East Chop, Mrs. Walter M. McGee, Mrs. Henry C. Meyer Jr. and Mrs. Frank G. Burke in Edgartown and will come to an end in the Edgartown garden of Mrs. Price Post (Emily Post), where tea will be served.

TENNIS FOR BAR HARBOR

BAR HARBOR, ME.

BAR HARBOR is "lookin' eastward to the sea" this week, watching for the arrival of the three ships of the United States Navy, which will bring the navy's best tennis players to take part in the international maritime tennis tournament, considered by many to be the most interesting event of the social season. The United States Ship Salt Lake City is expected soon, as well as the cruisers Memphis and Marblehead. The Bar Harbor Club, which arranged the tournament, will be host to the visiting officers and the club house will be their headquarters when ashore. The tournament will open on Monday, Aug. 4. Among the players will undoubtedly be Germann Upmann of Havana and Brooks Fenno Jr. of Boston. In the maritime championship tournament of 1929 Mr. Upmann won the men's singles, with T. G. Dawson, the men's doubles, and with Mrs. Richard Thorndike, the mixed doubles. Mr. Fenno in 1928 won permanent possession of the Bar Harbor trophy for men's doubles, playing with S. E. Ewing Jr. During the morning events of the Bar Harbor Club opening next Saturday, Miss Helen Meany, diving champion; Miss Elizabeth Busby, Middle Atlantic back-stroke champion, and Leslie F. Judd, director of tennis and swimming at the club, will give an exhibition of diving and fancy strokes and aquatic stunts, and Elmer Strasse, the club professional, will entertain with comedy on the diving board and in the water.

About 500 people will dine at the club that evening, among whom will be Major McMurtry's party of sixty. Following the dinner, the board of governors' ball opens at 10 o'clock.

The Bar Harbor Yacht Club has scheduled a special race for this week, besides the regular Wednesday and Saturday races. It is known as Ladies' Race, in which S. boats and M. D. I. boats are sailed by their lady owners, though captains may go with them. Among those who have entered their boats are Mrs. George McMurtry, Miss Phyllys Byrne, Mrs. Fulton Redman, Miss Eleanor McCormick, Miss Mildred McCormick, Miss Harriet Ogden, Miss Elizabeth Kent, Mrs. Schuyler Schiffelin, Miss Winnifred Thorndike and Miss Alice Vanderbilt Morris.

Mr. and Mrs. Pierrepont Hayward's yacht, Wanderer IX, has been a visitor in the harbor this week, with the owners on board, and Dr. Oliver Cope, Dr. John Gibbon and Dr. Walter Gary as guests; also the yacht Ingomar from the Eastern Yacht Club, Boston, carrying Carl P. Dennett, Miss Priscilla Dennett, John Morrill and P. W. Whittemore; and the yacht Memory with its owner, Duncan M. Spencer of New Haven.

The annual flower show of the Garden Club of Mount Desert, to which all lovers of flowers look forward with pleasure, will be held on Thursday in Bar Harbor's Building of Arts. There, where the long windows open upon grass terraces and mountain views, the lovely flowers from the gardens of Mount Desert are in an ideal setting, and the hall, large as it is, is invariably thronged with visitors from the moment of its opening until its closing. This year it is to be open from 3 to 6 in the afternoon and from 7 to 9 in the evening. Miss Harriet Ogden is chairman and Mrs. Mansfield Patterson is secretary of the show.

On Thursday about twenty-five yachts of the Northeast Harbor fleet will compete for the cup offered by the Village Improvement Association of Southwest Harbor, "to perpetuate the sea-going spirit of old Southwest Harbor, its enterprise, patience, hardihood and helpfulness in times of stress." The cup was won last year by C. Clark Zantzinger.

VARIED NEWPORT EVENTS

A Golf Tournament, Yachting and a Polo Game on Week's Program of Colony

NEWPORT, R. I.

GOLFERS, yachtsmen and polo enthusiasts in the Summer colony here are to have their fill of sport next week-end. While sporting events have been gaining in prominence, as they always do as each Summer advances, next week seems to be the climax, and sports will continue at their peak for the next few weeks.

The coming of August always means the livening of the sporting season, and on Thursday is the beginning of the fourth annual invitation golf tournament on the links of the Newport Country Club. The qualifying round is scheduled for that day, and match play will be in order for the two following days. Besides T. Suffern Tailer Jr., now the new Rhode Island amateur champion, and about all of the other leading men players in the colony who are members of the club taking part, the committee in charge has invited a large group of well-known amateur players from other clubs to participate. Many of them have already accepted, and everything seems to point to an interesting tournament.

After a couple of informal games early in the week, on Saturday, while the golfers are shooting, at the final round of their tournament, the polo players—and there are quite a number of them in the colony this year—will be racing around the field at Sandy Point Farm in Portsmouth in the important game of the week. Westchester's opponent in this game has not been announced, but there is sure to be a large gathering of Summer residents on the field, located on Mrs. Moses Taylor's estate.

Judging from the attendance at the informal practice matches this week and at the official opening game today between Westchester and the Buffalo team, polo is in for a real revival as far as this city is concerned. Practically all of the choice parking spaces about the field have already been engaged for the whole season.

Without so many other attractions, next week ordinarily would be termed yachting week in the city, for the end of the week is to see the many vessels of the New York Yacht Club moored in the harbor here to spend Sunday as the first stopover of the annual cruise.

On Thursday the yachtsmen here who intended to take part in the cruise this year began hustling away to the rendezvous in order to make the official start on Friday off New London on the first squadron run into this harbor.

Already plans are being formulated for considerable entertaining in honor of the visiting yachtsmen and by the yachtsmen themselves. They are to be entertained ashore at several of the Summer homes Saturday night, including that of Commodore and Mrs. Vincent Astor at Beechwood and former Commodore and Mrs. Arthur Curtiss James at Beacon Hill House, while in all probability there will be a dance at the Clambake Club the same night, if there is one in the villa colony.

Whenever the yachts have spent Sunday here that night has always been a lively one in the fleet, the owners of almost all of the larger craft having dinner parties aboard, and this year no doubt will be no exception to the rule.

Friday prior to the coming of the yachts also promises to be a gay day. There are to be a number of large dinner parties that night and in the late afternoon the naval colony is to have its innings. Rear Admiral Harris Laning, the new president of the Naval War College, and the members of the staff, have planned a reception and tea for the officers of the new classes and their wives. It will be the first official assemblage of the new college family, planned as a sort of get-together, especially for the families of the officers. The party is to take place at the college on Coasters Harbor Island. The members of the Summer colony will have another opportunity to assist at a church fair next week. They had two chances this week to help different churches and now it is the turn of St. John's Episcopal Church. Mr. and Mrs. Norman Ogden Whitehouse have offered the use of their estate, Eastbourne Lodge, the old family Summer homestead on Rhode Island Avenue, for the purpose on Wednesday afternoon and the members of the church, headed by Dr. Albert Knox as chairman, have made elaborate plans for the event. There is a large enclosed ground at Eastbourne Lodge.

100-YEAR-OLD KEEPSAKE RECOVERED THROUGH THE TIMES

The New York Times:

With misgivings as to the probability of ever getting it back, but with the urge to try every means, I inserted this advertisement in the Lost and Found columns of The New York Times:

> EARRING, screw, onyx, small pearls and onyx dangles, keepsake; reward. 2317 Stuyvesant.

At ten o clock the following day a lady from New Jersey telephoned for a fuller description of the earring and, to my great joy, a precious possession of my family's for over one hundred years has been returned to me.

G. H. SELCHOW,
11 West 10th St., New York.

More Lost and Found advertising appears in The Times than in any other New York newspaper and The Times circulation in New York and suburbs is greater than that of any other New York morning standard sized newspaper. Advertising rate 75 cents an agate line daily; 80 cents Sunday. Announcements received before midnight are in time for next day's insertion.

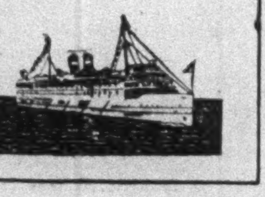
VERY IMPORTANT

CANADA STEAMSHIP LINES operate from the head of Lake Superior, via the St. Lawrence River, to the Saguenay. Their cruises include the seven day trip from Detroit to Duluth and return; Niagara to the Saguenay, including the Thousand Islands, and shooting the rapids; excursions from Toronto, the Queen City, to Niagara, the Thousand Islands and Rochester. They operate a fleet of 106 steamers, freight and passenger, and are the largest fresh water transportation company in the world. The famous Saguenay trip includes visits to Montreal, metropolis of Canada; Quebec, the historic walled city; Murray Bay, "Newport of the North" and Tadoussac, Canada's oldest settlement. The Saguenay Canyon is one of nature's masterpieces.

Our steamers may be boarded at Lewiston, Rochester, Duluth or Detroit in the U.S.A., or Sarnia, Queenston, Toronto, Montreal or Quebec in Canada.



THE glamour of a romantic past hangs over the walled city of Quebec. When you have explored its winding, cobbled streets, its great fortress and gay Dufferin Terrace, there remains to be seen the famous Shrine of St. Anne de Beaupré, some twenty motor miles away.

Then it's steam up again for the distant Saguenay, with a stop off at fashionable Murray Bay. Here the Manoir Richelieu lords it over mountain and river.

French Canada is a bit of old France transplanted and flourishing in forested shores of a new world.

Let our agent plan a little voyage of discovery to make it as smooth for you as the wide river you will follow.

Please write at once for illustrated folder, which describes in detail the pleasures of this wonderful vacation cruise.

WAY STATIONS FOR TRANSATLANTIC FLIGHTS

The Two Greenland Expeditions Now Seeking Geographic and Weather Data for the Northern Route Are Only Part of a Wide Pioneering Activity That Seeks to Establish Bases for a Regular Air Service Between Continents on Opposite Sides of the Wide-Flung Ocean

ISLAND WAY STATIONS ON AIR ROUTES TO EUROPE.

The Map Shows Possible Airways to Europe by Way of Greenland, With Water Stretches Less Than 400 Miles; or by the Southern Route, Crossing Bermuda and the Azores; or by Way of a Permanent Airway Over a Chain of Seadromes. The Top (Left) Picture Is a View of the Ice Cap in the Interior of Greenland. Centre Is a Sketch of One of the Proposed Seadromes Under Construction. Right Is a View of the Azores.

THE possibility of establishing way stations across the Atlantic has been brought into prominence by two expeditions to Greenland, the British Arctic Air Route expedition, under the leadership of H. G. Watkins, and the German expedition led by Professor Alfred Wegener. The discoveries and adventures of these scientific parties will be told from time to time in The New York Times.

By T. J. C. MARTYN.

THE fact that there are two expeditions starting intensive investigation work in Greenland indicates a significant hardening of faith in the prospects of regular aerial transit between America and Europe over the North Atlantic. The British Arctic Air Route expedition is, as its name signifies, frankly an aeronautical undertaking, its meteorological and geographical work being supplementary to the establishment of a prospective airway between Great Britain and the Dominion of Canada. The German expedition under the leadership of Professor Alfred Wegener is mainly interested in meteorology and geology for the purpose of solving some highly important weather problems. But the expedition will act, nevertheless, for the German Government in ascertaining possibilities which Greenland offers for an air base.

The actual significance of these two undertakings from an aeronautical standpoint, it must be admitted, is largely potential; for, so far as the establishment of a commercial airway between the Old and New Worlds is concerned, the outcome will be in doubt until the pioneering is ended. What may then be done will depend largely on the scientific discoveries which the two expeditions report. Meantime, the whole question of ocean crossings by airplane and airship is brought into focus.

Achievements of the Airship.

The airship has already shown its capabilities in flying across the North Atlantic. We have conclusive proof that it can carry relatively enormous cargoes over the seas without the need of a mid-ocean base. As it can carry a large reserve of fuel, it has also proved its ability to skirt storms and thus to take advantage of fine weather and favorable winds. This has been the contribution which the Graf Zeppelin has made to the future of transocean flying by airship.

There are many things, however, which we do not know about airship travel. The Graf Zeppelin is admittedly an obsolete ship, and its passengers and freight were carried at rates that would in all probability preclude regular commercial operation. Compared to airplanes, airships are tremendously expensive to build, each one running into many millions of dollars. Will the more efficient airships of the future be able to offer rates comparable to those of ocean liners, taking into consideration the time saved? Will they be cheaper to operate if they have mid-ocean bases? These are matters which the future jealously guards.

The airplane, by contrast, is entirely dependent, in so far as commercial operation over the sea is concerned, on mid-ocean bases. The reason for this is that its carrying capacity over a 3,000-mile distance is barely equal to the fuel and crew it must carry. In every case of a successful or attempted transocean hop, the plane has taken off overloaded to the danger point. Even the giant Dornier DO-X flying boats cannot carry a reasonable pay load over a non-stop flight across the Atlantic because the weight of fuel is so tremendous. And these deductions do not take into account a reserve of fuel which is indispensable over long-distance flying.

Because it is something close to twice as fast and one-tenth as costly as an airship, a giant airplane has the tremendous advantage of reducing to a minimum the time in flight and the cost per mile flown between any two points. It is unlikely that an airship will be able to operate on a commercial schedule between New York and Europe in less than three days, at best. But it is entirely possible that an airplane might fly between New York and London in twenty-four hours. However, such a fast flight could only be made safely in a series of hops, either to land points across the Atlantic or to man-made stations anchored a few hundred miles apart and at a cruising speed of not less than 150 miles an hour.

Land Along the Route.

It is usual to think of the North Atlantic as an immense body of water lying between the continents of North America and Europe, with no land in between except for a few insignificant islands. Such is not the case, for there are several routes which airplanes could follow, if weather conditions were not impossible, that would take them over land most of the way.

If you look at a Mercator map you will see Greenland far to the north, with wide expanses of sea separating it from the mainlands of Canada and Northern Europe. But if you look at Greenland on a map of polyconic projection (that is, a map which takes into account the earth's curvature) you may be surprised to discover that Greenland juts down just like a wedge in between the two continents. It is, moreover, a fact that the water-jumps between London and New York need be never more than 400 miles long, as contrasted with the 1,900 miles of sea that lie between Newfoundland and Ireland. Here, then, is a possible route for airplanes.

Because Greenland lies directly on a great circle route (that is, a route following the shortest distance between two points in high latitudes) from such places as Chicago and Winnipeg to Northern Europe, it is of tremendous potential value, especially to Great Britain, as an imperial link between herself and the Dominion of Canada. It is evidently in recognition of this fact that the British expedition is surveying for a possible airway between London and the Dominion. Thus Greenland may one day become an outpost of the British Empire, hardly less important to it than Gibraltar and the Suez Canal.

Survey of the Airway.

The first leg of this airway is now being surveyed by the British Air Ministry. It runs from London to the north of Scotland on the coast of Sutherland, between Cape Wrath and Pentland Firth, a distance of 500 miles. The next stage is to Thorshavn, at the north of the Faroe Islands, via the Shetland Islands. The distance from Scotland to Thorshavn is about 300 miles, and the two water jumps are respectively about 90 and 160 miles across. The next hop is from Thorshavn to Reykjavik in Iceland, a distance of about 500 miles, some 320 miles being across the ocean.

From Reykjavik the plane would fly to Greenland, a water span of close to 400 miles, depending on where the plane landed in Greenland. Here the airway would bifurcate, one route running south to Cape Farewell, at the tip of Greenland, thence for about 600 miles over the sea to Labrador and on to Montreal and New York. The other route would span Greenland, possibly to Godhavn on Disko Island, and thence across 200 miles of Davis Strait to Baffin Land. The airway would then follow a land route to Fort Churchill, on Hudson Bay, and on to Winnipeg, with a spur running southeast to Chicago. Or a line might be established to Cape Chidley and on to Montreal and New York. The Canadian Government has undertaken to survey for a possible air route between Winnipeg and Baffin Land.

Such are the makings of an air route between Europe and America. A great deal has to be found out before it can even be called practical. The greater part of it runs well to the north of the sixtieth parallel, where fogs are prevalent for a large part of the year. It is thought, however, that with the aid of radio direction beacons the fog peril may be cut to a negligible hazard. Perhaps television may remove the hazard altogether. But Greenland itself is both a hazard and a haven.

The hymn about Greenland's icy mountains was not in the least overdone. But, except for a ribbon of land around the coast line, the whole interior of the country is covered by an enormous glacier rising in places to 9,000 feet and covering most of Greenland's 827,275 square miles. Such a glacier is a formidable object for an airplane to surmount; for, in order to rise two miles into the air, the pay load would have to be reduced and that would mean commensurate loss to the operators. However, Greenland is largely terra incognita, and the British expedition hopes to discover a depression in the ice cap that will permit easier transit.

Although Greenland is one of the coldest places in the world outside Antarctica, which it much resembles, it has one redeeming feature. When Admiral Richard E. Byrd flew over a section of Northern Greenland six years ago, he reported that he could have landed with ease anywhere except in the neighborhood of the coast line. So far as is known (and Greenland has been crossed several times in various places) there is a vast interior basin as flat as a ballroom floor. Here, then, is a natural landing space of enormous proportions. It remains to be seen if the smoothness of the ice cap has not been worn by high velocity winds with a force too great for airplanes to resist. If the interior is found impassable, there is still the southern route, via Cape Farewell, to be considered.

There is, however, another island route to the south which offers comparative freedom from bad weather. This is the route followed by the Graf Zeppelin and by the navy fliers in 1919. It affords two island way-stations for aircraft, one at Bermuda and the other at the Azores. This route is roughly about the same distance from New York to London as the Greenland route. From New York a plane would fly to Bermuda, about 700 miles, thence to the Azores, about 1,600 miles, thence to Portugal, about 800 miles, and on to London, another 700 miles. Even the shortest water hops are therefore about twice the length of the longest water stretches over the Greenland route.

In considering the southern route one immediately comes up hard against the problem of airplane economics. To cross 1,600 miles of water it is reasonable to suppose that an airplane would have to carry enough fuel to fly 2,000 miles, in the event of meeting adverse winds or getting temporarily lost. This is still too great a load of fuel to enable an airplane to operate on a feasible commercial schedule. How great this load would be in the case of the twelve-engined DO-X, which is at present the most practical aircraft for ocean crossings, may be seen by the results of a simple problem in arithmetic.

It is a remarkably good high-powered engine that will run, throttled down, on ten gallons of gasoline an hour. For the sake of argument let us suppose that each of the twelve engines of the DO-X consumes ten gallons of gas an hour delivering a speed of 100 miles an hour. Sixteen hours are required to make the flight between the Azores and Bermuda, or sixteen times ten times twelve (since there are twelve engines). This equals 1,920 gallons. But we must add four hours of fuel as a reserve, or 480 gallons, making a grand total of 2,400 gallons. Multiply 2,400 by six (the weight in pounds of a gallon of gasoline) and you have a total of 14,400 pounds of fuel, not counting oil. This is more than half the disposable load of the craft and is obviously uneconomical, unless the public can be made to pay extremely high fares for the saving of time, which would amount to about four days as compared with an ocean liner's time.

The Alternative Routes.

Contrast both the southern and the Greenland routes with the direct route from New York to London, which is about 1,000 miles shorter, and you find that there is a land route most of the way up to Cape Race at the tip end of Newfoundland. This is not quite the shortest way to get to Cape Race, but it is the safest. From Cape Race to the coast of Ireland is about 1,900 miles, or but 300 miles longer than the hop from Bermuda to the Azores. It might be argued that the saving of 1,000 miles warrants the extra 300 miles of sea flight. It might be, but against that argument is the fact of the much more unfavorable weather conditions over the middle route.

When Colonel Lindbergh arrived in Paris after his memorable flight he wrote in one of his first dispatches that "to my mind, proper meteorological observation and reports about conditions over the Atlantic are the first essentials in any development of transatlantic flying. These reports can be obtained only by having regular water stations along the ocean route, with full meteorological and other kinds of equipment, to give service and help to airmen." In commenting on the possibility of mid-ocean stations, he says further: "In my opinion future Atlantic crossings will be made as long runs on railroads are made today. In other words, there will be floating islands where planes may land, reship their mail, cargo and passengers into a fresh plane with a new pilot who will take off for the next point."

These "floating islands" may sound like a far-fetched idea, but in point of fact the idea has been pronounced sound by a number of reputable engineers and work is under way on the construction of the first seadrome, as they are called, which is to be anchored between here and Bermuda. It is scheduled for completion next year, when it should be put to the acid test of proving its merit. If it is found to be practical (as tests of a model indicate it will be) the picture of ocean airways is miraculously transformed.

The principle of the seadrome, according to its inventor, E. R. Armstrong, is a remarkably simple one. We know that sea storms are only surface manifestations and that below the trough of the highest waves the water is comparatively stable, except for determinable currents, which are relatively slow. We know, furthermore, that the deeper the water the greater the pressure, and as the pressure increases it is obvious that the water is less and less disturbed by exterior forces. Hence the idea is to use this relatively undisturbed water as a foundation for a floating island.

Construction of Seadromes.

The Armstrong seadromes will be built of steel, 1,100 feet long and 340 feet wide in the central area. Above deck will be hangars, radio station, workshop, hotel, &c. The deck will be seventy feet above the surface of the sea, or high enough to permit the angriest wave to pass underneath. Supporting the huge deck are thirty-two buoyancy tanks connected to it by streamlined iron columns. The tanks are all thirty-eight feet deep and of varying diameters. All are sunk twenty feet below mean water level. Below the buoyancy tanks lower columns extend ninety-seven feet to ballast tanks, which are twenty-two feet deep, and are designed to give the whole structure stability. Thus the submarine structure is 177 feet deep and the superstructure above water is seventy feet high, or an over-all measurement of 247 feet. It is estimated that the first seadrome will cost about $4,000,000.

These floating islands will be anchored to the ocean floor along cables of the kind that are being used in the construction of the Hudson River Bridge, and the anchors themselves are designed on a principle that will permit the seadrome automatically to pivot into the wind without fouling. Thus an aviator approaching a seadrome will know that it is always heading into the wind.

A Series of Stations.

If the first full-sized seadrome proves a success it is proposed to establish a permanent ocean airway with seadromes every 350 miles. The route will go 350 miles southeast midway between the American coast and Bermuda and then strike out in a straight line to the Azores. Five seadromes will be needed. The route then turns sharply northeast until 350 miles off Brest. The third and last seadrome in this span will act as an ocean terminus for any part of Northern Europe, while the middle one would be a jumping off point for Southern Europe, across Portugal and Spain. The weather along this route should be good.

If the great circle route from New York could be used, fewer than eight seadromes would be necessary, for they would be required only between Cape Race and Ireland. Probably four would be enough. Likewise such a route would save about 1,000 miles. Against it, however, is the uncertainty of the weather and the abounding fogs.

There are many ifs and ands and buts in the problem of ocean airways, and whether ultimate victory is to rest with the airship or the airplane, over the Greenland route or the southern route, or following either a long or a short chain of seadromes, one thing is certain—a start has been made in an attempt to make flying across the Atlantic as safe as it humanly can be made. It will doubtless be years before the airplane is a vehicle of regular transportation between this continent and Europe, but no one need be surprised if science solves the riddle and gives us a twenty-four-hour service to Paris.

THE EARTHQUAKE TAKES A MIGHTY TOLL

Disaster in Italy Due to a Phenomenon That Man Only Partly Understands

By WILLIAM L. LAURENCE.

THE latest earthquake disaster, of last Tuesday in Southern Italy, has once more focused the world's attention on a still untamed, little understood natural phenomenon, terrible in its result, ominous in its implications. The earthquake is still one of nature's completely wild, wholly uncontrolled forces, against which man, with all his proud scientific achievements, is as completely helpless and powerless today as was the man who dwelt in caves. In fact, civilized men, with their development of large areas of congested population, have been compelled to yield a much greater toll to the ravages of this force than were the men of earlier eras of scattered settlements and small cities.

With the recent advances in the science of seismology and the development of delicate instruments for the investigation of seismic disturbances, we have learned that earthquakes are much more common than had been originally supposed. In fact, in some parts of the world earthquakes are a daily occurrence, and heavy shocks produce vibrations that extend over the entire globe.

The average seismic frequency is probably greatest in Japan, where records showed a total of 8,831 shocks in a period of eight years, an average of three a day. The larger number of earthquakes, however, belong to the class of unfelt disturbances known as microseisms. The destructively violent types, such as occurred in Italy, known as macroseisms, are relatively rare, and often they are centred in remote localities or under the sea, so that they attract little notice.

Earthquakes, it is now well known, are unequally distributed over the world. They occur frequently and with destructive strength. On the whole, lofty mountain regions, regions in which there are great inequalities between land surface and adjacent sea bottom, and particularly regions containing what is known as "fault-scarps," or fissures in the rock formation in the outer layer of the earth's crust, are recognized as seismic areas.

The American Zone.

One of the main seismic zones includes the western coasts of North and South America, with their mountain ranges and precipitous shore lines. This zone joins on the north with another great zone which extends from Southeastern Asia across the Japanese Archipelago, the Kurile Islands, and the Aleutian chain to the Alaska mainland. A third has an east-west trend through the Mediterranean, the Azores, the West Indies, Central America, Hawaii, the East Indies, the Himalayan Range, Persia and Asia Minor. The eastern coast of America and the western part of Europe are comparatively free from such disturbances. There are countries, such as Switzerland, in which earthquakes are numerous but seldom cause damage, while in countries like Brazil, Egypt or the centre of Russia they occur very seldom and then only in weak form.

Counting only those earthquakes which devastated cities, the record shows thirty-nine of these in China, twenty-two in Japan, twenty-one in the Philippines, nineteen in Greece, sixteen in Italy, eleven in Chile, eight in Peru and one in the United States.

Robert Mallet, one of the first modern scientific seismologists, who, in fact, coined the term seismology in 1858, was the first to make an earthquake map of the world. According to this map earthquakes occur in bands of from five to fifteen degrees in width. These bands follow as a rule the lines of elevation that divide the great oceanic or continental areas of the earth, and so lie along the lines of mountains or volcanic vents, the areas of least disturbance being along the centre of great oceanic and continental areas, or on large islands in shallow seas.

As to the frequency of earthquakes, Milne, another maker of earthquake maps, estimated that, including slight tremors, there were not less than 30,000 a year. Of the great earthquakes, those that destroy towns, Mallet recorded one a year in the first half of the nineteenth century, and Milne four a year during its last quarter

The number of persons killed in destructive earthquakes is greater than any destructive force known to man. The number was 50,000 dead in the Lisbon earthquake in 1755; 76,483 dead and 93,470 wounded in the Messina disaster in 1908; 180,000 in the Chinese earthquake of 1920; 200,000 in the Japan earthquake of 1703, and 300,000, the largest figure known, in the Indian earthquake of 1737. The Japanese earthquake in 1923 resulted in 99,331 dead, 103,733 wounded, and 43,476 missing.

The Causes of Quakes.

The causes of earthquakes have been a subject of speculation since very early times, but it is only recently, with the adoption of instrumental experimentation during the last century or so, that real progress has been made. The difficulty of the study is in the fact that the origin of the disturbances lies within the hidden depths of the earth, and the exact conditions there can only be inferred.

It is generally recognized that two principal causes are concerned in earthquakes—one being styled tectonic and the other volcanic. The tectonic refers to crustal dislocations, particularly the differential movements along fissures known as "faults." From time to time stresses accumulate in the strata to a point where the elastic limit is exceeded, resulting in a rupture or a slip,

THEY SAY—

By PRESIDENT HOOVER.

Just before signing the London naval treaty.

WITH the ratification by the other governments the treaty will translate an emotion deep in the hearts of millions of men and women into a political fact of government and international relations. It will renew again the faith of the world in the moral forces of good-will and patient negotiation as against the blind forces of suspicion and competitive armament.

It will secure the full defense of the United States. It will mark a further long step toward lifting the burden of militarism from the backs of mankind and to speed the march forward of world peace. It will lay the foundations upon which further constructive reduction in world arms may be accomplished in the future.

We should, by this act of willingness to join with others in limiting armament, have dismissed from the mind of the world any notion that the United States entertains ideas of aggression, imperial power or exploitation of foreign nations.

By PROFESSOR JOHN DEWEY,
President of the People's Lobby.

In a letter to President Hoover made public last week.

IT is obvious that with a national income (in 1928) estimated by the National Bureau of Economic Research at $89,419,000,000, we can consume in this country at least twice the value of merchandise exported in recent years in addition to present consumption. The total value of such merchandise exported, exclusive of wheat, is only about 5 per cent of the national income.

At present between 2,400,000 and 3,500,000 persons, many of them heads of families, are out of the consuming class entirely, or except for the barest necessities for existence—because so long unemployed.

A nation-wide system of contributory unemployment insurance with the Federal Government paying $1,000,000,000 and States, employers and employes jointly, the same amount—in the aggregate about 2.2 per cent of the national income—would largely relieve the most serious unemployment; needless to emphasize, it would also improve business conditions to a very marked extent. The proposed Federal Government's contribution to conquer this real menace at home is only a small amount more than it spends to prepare to fight a non-existent enemy abroad.

For these reasons we ask you to call the Congress in special session to deal with this probem, which it ignored in the session just closed.

By PATRICK JAY HURLEY,
Secretary of War.

In a radio address.

THE government is just completing the census of our people. The results indicate that the second quarter of the twentieth century will see an increase of forty millions in our population. We are confronted by the great task of providing the intricate transportation system for forty million people embracing highways, waterways, railways and airways.

In addition to this, we must realize that our present transportation system is no more than adequate for the present population. Careful planning on a national basis is necessary to solve this great engineering and economic problem without placing an unreasonable burden on our people and without injury to our existing systems of transportation.

Broad engineering vision and strong executive guidance are necessary in order that the present transportation facilities, rail, water, highway and airway, may be expanded and utilized to meet the needs of a rapidly growing population.

To meet the situation by building more trunk line railroads instead of utilizing and improving nature's water routes would be economically unsound. Railroads will be expanded, highways will be multiplied and airways will perform their specilized services.

Waterways, properly utilized, relieve other forms of transportation by moving the bulk, low-rate commodities which constitute the basic material in many important industries.

Nature has provided our nation with far-reaching waterways. The complete improvement and the full utilization of waterways for the needs of industry and agriculture is a task that will take ages to complete, but the system can be put in operation in a comparatively few years.

By THE PRINCE OF WALES.

At a luncheon given by the Honourable Company of Master Mariners in honor of Sir Thomas Lipton in London.

THE yacht America won the cup in a race round the Isle of Wight in 1851, and American yachtsmen have held it ever since. Sir Thomas Lipton's first Shamrock was built in 1899. The selected American defender was then Columbia, which won three straight races somewhat easily. Shamrock II was his second challenger, and raced in 1901 against the same defending yacht, the Columbia. This series of races was remarkable for the close finishes—the difference in the times being a matter of seconds—and in the final race Shamrock finished ahead of Columbia, but lost through having to give her thirty-odd seconds time allowance, and Columbia again won the series. A notable incident associated with Shamrock II was that of her being dismasted when engaged in a trial race in the Solent, on which occasion King Edward was on board. Fortunately no one was injured.

Shamrock III was built to race in 1903 and was opposed by Reliance, which was regarded as somewhat of a freak, being of the scow type with the immense sail area of 16,000 square feet. Shamrock III, though a fast and very beautiful boat, could not keep pace with her huge rival, and was defeated in three straight races. Shamrock IV was built to race for the America's Cup in 1914 and left this country, convoyed by Sir Thomas Lipton's steam yacht Erin, about the middle of July of that year. She passed through the great fleet, then assembled at Spithead, on her way across the Atlantic, and when war was declared on Aug. 4 she was well over.

The Erin wireless operator learned the news of the declaration of war by intercepting a message to a German cruiser in the neighborhood, and later got in touch with a British cruiser, on whose instructions Erin towed Shamrock IV to Bermuda and later to New York, where Shamrock IV remained until 1920, when the contest was held, with the result that, although Shamrock IV won the first two races, she was finally defeated by the Resolute winning the remaining three. Shamrock V is built to the Americans' own universal rule under their J class. All interested in yachting know that she has shown remarkable pace and racing qualities.

In all this great effort Sir Thomas has upheld the great tradition of British yachting and British sportsmanship, and while we congratulate him on his great efforts in the past and proudly acknowledge the stimulus and encouragement he has given to all those who are engaged upon, and interested in, this sport of the sea, I think it is his pluck that calls for most admiration. We wish him the very best of luck, and no body of men in the world will watch and hope for his triumph more than the Honourable Company of Master Mariners. All we ask is a turn of luck, and, in the presence of the American Ambassador, I say I believe it will be as popular in America as it will be in this country if, at 80 years of age, Sir Thomas brings back to this country the cup which was won by America when he was 1 year old.

By MRS. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

In a radio address.

THERE is at present abroad a spirit of truth which is, I think, a great asset to the real relationship between the generations, but which requires the building up of trust between them.

For this trust the older generation must be mainly responsible. It is very easy to make the younger generation decide that there is no use trying to explain their point of view or problems to people who are evidently only shocked. When youth states things that it observes or feels, and this older generation has apparently no ability to understand or to interpret life in any new way for youth, they naturally feel there is nothing to be gained by frankness.

We must learn to preserve out of the past some of the things which are good. We must attain a philosophy of life which will bring us peace and the knowledge of the things which are really worth while. If we older people can achieve this we may be able to pass it on to the younger generation. Only in that way can we be of any real value to it.

By ROBERT B. RAUP,
Professor of Philosophy of Education at Columbia.

In an address before the Tawse Club last Thursday night.

OUR public school system is based on the false belief that the education of children and of young people can provide a guarantee for a desirable quality of adult life and citizenship. No error could be more misleading than that of believing that we must prepare the child for adult years. The child has been separated from his own rightful life in order to learn about the problems that confront adults. When he becomes an adult he finds he has been robbed on all sides. What he "learned" has largely gone, and he is not prepared for adult years. He has lost his childhood, and he is, as a result, losing a growing adulthood.

The adult is discovering that if he is to go on learning according to his needs he must have help in some appropriate form when he is at grips with the problems that confront him. The only education for adults that can eventually be counted adequate is that which is contemporaneous in effect. But to be contemporaneous in effect it must be largely so in process. The business of education is to reconstruct and get better controls over the process of experience as it goes on. As such it is primarily and essentially in the present, and in the past only incidentally to the present.

This nation is spending millions of dollars each year on public education. This is not too much to spend for education. But we are deceiving ourselves by thinking that in spending this large amount of money we are getting genuine public education. Genuine public education is a matter of adults tackling the business of shaping and reshaping their present environment and becoming masters of themselves in the process. This function cannot be delegated to a group of persons who are hired to teach the children of these adults.

By MAJOR W. PEER GROVES,

Addressing the Rotary Club of Manchester, England, on Beer as a Pure Article of Food.

HERODOTUS put on record that the ancient Egyptians were expert brewers, and regarded barley wine as an invention of the gods. Untold British workmen heartily agree with him. Beer is, in short, a happy combination of meat and drink. Small wonder it has become the national beverage of the hardier northern nations of the Western World.

The praise of London ales was sung both by Chaucer and Shakespeare.

FOOTNOTES ON A WEEK'S HEADLINES

An Elusive Refuser.

NOW is the chance for some coiner of happy phrases. George Bernard Shaw will accept a peerage provided a title will be given to him that is at least as distinguished, he says, as his present name. The Labor party would like to have Mr. Shaw in the House of Lords because it feels his presence there would bolster the Labor peers. The irreverent would like to see him there, too, because he could not fail to bring humor to the Upper House of Parliament.

Mr. Shaw is elusive enough now without people trying to give him an appropriate title. Since the death of Sir Arthur Conan Doyle many impressionable persons have been seeing apparitions. One of them has been the vision of a long-legged, white-bearded septuagenarian on the rear saddle of Colonel T. E. Lawrence's motorcycle. Quick imaginations have identified Private Shaw's mysterious rider as "Playwright Shaw, and so insistent was this report that Mr. Shaw was interviewed. He has not been riding pillion behind Col. Lawrence, he says, because he has a perfectly good motor bike of his own. As for Lawrence, he has not been found. He has been reported in Kurdistan, Iraq, Egypt, Hedjaz, Peshawar, Afghanistan and in other places where native voices are raised in anger; therefore, why shouldn't he be bouncing over Hampstead Heath with Mr. Shaw behind him?

And so Mr. Shaw refuses the reputation of motor-bike riding behind Lawrence of Arabia, as he does the title of Baron Bernard of Shaw. He is one of the great refusers of the age. Not only does he refuse a peerage, but he has refused to come to America, to sign movie contracts, to run for office, to give autographs, to receive bores, to accept martyrdom, to lose his temper and to take things seriously.

The Investigating Mr. Higgins.

IN charge of Mayor Walker's investigation of Mayor Walker's administration is James A. Higgins, Commissioner of Accounts. His job it will be to inspect and attempt to identify the "fingerprints on the wall" that the Mayor said last week existed also on the record of his administration.

A former school teacher, a lawyer, a one-time State Senator, and a serious, prematurely bald young man is Commissioner Higgins. He married one of Governor Smith's nieces, he has been a firm friend of Mayor Walker, and the frequently censorious Citizen Union has praised him as "attentive to duties." Had he supported Mayor Hylan he might have been a judge, but a certain Mr. McCooey of Brooklyn took offense of his opposition, and the black silk gown went to some one else. On the other hand, this opposition had something to do with Mayor Walker's appointing him Commissioner of Accounts.

In this post Mr. Higgins has pried into the affairs of a number of city departments and laid bare conditions persons involved preferred not to have made public. Some street cleaners in the Bronx were forging names to payrolls. The stern, painstaking Mr. Higgins looked into the matter with the result that some new names appeared upon the records of Sing Sing. Some employes of the County Clerk's office of Manhattan indulged in some unorthodox bookkeeping. Mr. Higgins checked over their figures and again some people put on prison clothes. Complaints were made about conditions in the city hospitals. Mr. Higgins asked some questions, discovered that responsibility was divided and later the hospitals were consolidated under one head. Commissioner Higgins is said to enjoy investigating.

Mr. Higgins's friendship with Mayor Walker began in Albany and it began with a good, old-fashioned row. "When I first went to Albany as a Senator in 1922," said Commissioner Higgins," I was a bit green, rather enthusiastic and determined my district would be taken care of with jobs. So the first day I went to the office of Senator Jimmy Walker, then majority leader, and told him I wanted six or seven clerks taken care of. He looked at me belligerently and told me I couldn't have them. I answered that if he didn't fix me up I was going back to Brooklyn and that would be the end of the Democratic majority. I was so mad I took the next train home. I cooled off in a few days, returned to Albany and made peace with him. That was the start of one of the best friendships I ever made."

Thirty Years on a Pillar.

THE pole-sitters and the tree-sitters now rising to fame in this land are mere trivial imitators of St. Simeon Stylites, who won a world reputation in their line of endurance fifteen centuries ago. Simeon was a monk of Syria. Dismissed from a monastery for his "excessive austerities," one of which was to bind his limbs with rope until they bled, he built a pillar six feet high and one yard wide, near Antioch, and became the first pillar hermit.

New and higher towers he built. At last on one sixty feet high he began his longest test. For thirty years he occupied his narrow perch in all weathers without once descending. A rail kept him from falling, a ladder enabled his disciples to supply him with food. Pilgrims flocked from far lands to hear him preach. Many miracles and many converts are ascribed to him. Although aloof from the world, he had an influential part in the ecclesiastical politics of his time. On his pillar he died in the year 459.

Many ascetics imitated him. His favorite pupil, Daniel, stood for thirty-three years on a pedestal near Constantinople. As late as the sixteenth century the Stylites were numerous. The Western branch of the Church disapproved of their sort of piety. When Wulflaicus erected a pillar near Trèves, in the sixth century, and proposed to spend the remainder of his days on it, the nearby Bishops dissuaded him by destroying his eyrie.

Solid With the Granite State.

SENATOR GEORGE H. MOSES is still in fine favor in his own corner of New England, whatever his relations may be with the administration forces in Washington and with the "sons of the wild jackass" of the West. Senators up for reelection in Rhode Island, Nebraska and elsewhere may not invite his help, but that is their loss, think the people of New Hampshire.

"If you have a pension bill or any claim of that sort," says a Carroll County political leader, "you can always get quick action through Moses. He is the best Senator we have ever had, that way. He certainly knows the ropes down there. I reckon they don't come much smarter than George.

"About the Naval Treaty, if he and Johnson think it is a mistake, maybe they are right and the rest wrong. Time proves a heap of things wrong that once seemed right to the majority. Wait ten years and you may see George vindicated yet."

The Senator is known not to be a Hoover enthusiast. "Well, as to that," said his disciple, "most likely he has his reasons and good ones." New Hampshire would not be at all astonished if Mr. Hoover should turn out to be a one-term President.

Will Senator Moses be re-elected in 1933? "I calculate so, if he wants the job. There's nobody else of size in sight so far. Oh, yes, there's a crowd that call themselves Progressives, or some such name, but the run of us don't fellowship with them to any extent. And, of course, there are the women. They're not very keen about George, somehow, the women. He was against suffrage, you know, and the women don't forget in politics so easy as the men. They aren't so easy to put off. When they once get a notion, you can't talk 'em out of it.

"But, otherwise, I should say that George's horizon was just about as clear of clouds as any great man's ever is in this troubled world."

The World's Population.

THE population of the world continues to grow and grow and grow. The recent national disputation known as the census has led to widespread currency of the suspicion that the United States has now pretty close to 123,000,000 people. This seems to include a surprisingly large proportion of the population of North America, last estimated at 138,000,000 people. That figure will now have to be revised, however, because Canada has some 9,000,000 people and Mexico close to 16,000,000. In South America the estimate is 66,000,000; in Asia, 950,000,000; in Europe, 480,000,000, and in Australia something over 10,000,000. "Other countries and regions" are credited with an additional 167,000,000, and even the Eskimos in the Arctic are counted—33,000.

One of the few countries to remain put, in square miles, is England; the United Kingdom, specifically. And England's population is not growing by leaps or bounds. In fact, British actuaries believe that the kingdom will soon reach a general stability of population, varying not much below or above 42,000,000, with the falling birth and death rates equalizing each other. The population of the United States is not expected to reach this stationary position for some time. Professor E. M. East of Harvard believes that a stationary population of 200,000,000 will be reached "before 2000 A. D." The population of the world, now placed at 1,900,000,000, is expected to double itself if the present rate of increase—five-eighths of 1 per cent per year—keeps up, in 110 years.

AT seaside and lakeside here and there prim municipal authorities are quarreling again with trim women bathers. Girls in extra-trim bathing costumes are warned off the beach, the boardwalk and the public streets, and some of them defy the warning. Only a generation ago women bathers were not so openly resentful of the ordinances that fashion and the local police laid down for them. Yet they resented in their hearts. A grandmother whose hair is not yet gray recalls what she wore on the sands at Long Branch in the gay nineties.

"As a foundation," she says, "a corset. Over that a flannel blouse of black, with a wide sailor collar, buttoned close under the chin, and sleeves to the elbows. The collar had a thin edging of white, otherwise the costume was deeply melancholy. There were stockings, to be sure—one function of the corset was to assist in holding them up. Over the stockings were loose and baggy bloomers of heavy wool, pleated at the top so that they added three thicknesses of cloth around the waist and the hips. Over the bloomers was a skirt that hung well below the knees to the tops of the high-laced bathing shoes. The head was encased in a cap of heavy black silk. Bathing in such an outfit," she adds, "was never a pastime. It was an ordeal."

Well, in these days of milder frays
Than gallants fought of yore,
When tame careers consume our years,
And knighthood flowers no more,
Can we be lured to leave the house
As modernistic clothes guys,
Can we espouse the middy blouse
Any more than those guys!

NEW YORK'S DESTINY AS REVEALED IN CENSUS FIGURES

The Metropolitan District, Changing With the Times, Expanding Along Certain Fixed Lines, Becoming Always More Intricately Interwoven, Is Taking Final Form as the World's Greatest Urban Area

By R. L. DUFFUS.

AS the 1930 census figures for the New York metropolitan district emerge from the government's adding machines, the picture of the mighty city of today and the still vaster city of tomorrow becomes increasingly clear. In ten years the district has gained 27.8 per cent, or nearly 2,500,000 in population, reaching the grand total of 11,605,069. Nearly half of this enormous increment—1,121,046—is located within the district but outside the political boundaries of New York City. A tremendous concentration of population has been paradoxically accompanied by a remarkable drift toward the suburbs and the smaller cities. Before 1940, it is now evident, New York will pass London, and there will be more human beings living within forty miles of City Hall than have been gathered in a like space in human history.

As the district grows—and by the district nowadays one means five New York City boroughs, nine New Jersey counties, three counties and a portion of another in New York State, and a part of Fairfield County, Conn.—it changes its pattern. Indeed, it could not grow rapidly if it did not change its pattern. The pattern changes so rapidly that it can never be brought up to date. If the location of every individual in the district at a given hour could be indicated on a gigantic map today, the map would be obsolete tomorrow because perhaps 400 individuals would have died, 1,200 would have been born or would have moved in from somewhere else, and an indefinite number would have shifted from the city to the suburbs, the suburbs to the city, from one residence to another and from one job to another. But whereas, except for being born or dying, most of us seem to ourselves to be making free choices in these matters the truth is that we are all subject to certain forces which make us in the mass flow here and collect there, like drops of water in a river or lake. We can figure out roughly the way these forces are working.

Past and Future.

A birdseye view tells the story of the years that have rolled over the region since the white man came and shows pretty plainly what is to come. Manhattan, the first spot to be settled, is still densest in population, with more than 84,000 persons to the square mile. Brooklyn, once a proud independent city and larger in its own right than any other American city except Chicago, outranks Manhattan but has only 36,000 to the square mile. The Bronx, having added since 1920 nearly as many inhabitants as Baltimore had in that year, has 30,000 to the square mile. Manhattan has remained the focus, even while its residential population was actually declining 400,000 from the 2,284,000 who inhabited it in 1920. The East River and the Harlem River were easier to bridge and cross than the Hudson or the Narrows. Population marched northward along Manhattan Island but long before it had reached Spuyten Duyvil had overleaped the water barriers to the east and northeast.

We see that process still going on, with hundreds of thousands of people pouring through the tunnels and over the bridges. The Bronx, which ten years ago still had many isolated spaces, sucked in humanity as though every tunnel had a gigantic pump at the end of it. It gained 72.6 per cent in the decade. Apartment houses sprang up as though some Cyclops had plowed the land and sewed the seed. The old houses, with their green lawns, vanished. The truck gardens shrunk and withered. And now, because the subways which created the modern Bronx cannot carry its people comfortably to and fro, new subway lines are being gouged out under what not very long ago were country roads. No such boom occurred in Brooklyn, whose downtown sections were already almost as solidly built up as downtown Manhattan. But Brooklyn added to itself the equivalent of a city the size of San Francisco as it was ten years ago. The currents of change swirled around even such quiet harbors as Columbia Heights. A new sky line shot into the air, giving promise before long of challenging Manhattan's.

Eastward Trend.

But a part of Manhattan's overflow passed Brooklyn by and swarmed into the open lands of Queens, Nassau and Suffolk. Queens had 469,000 in 1920. In ten years it added the equivalent of the Pittsburgh of 1920 and now has more than 1,000,000. Nassau had 136,000 in 1920; now it has more than 300,000, a gain of 139 per cent. Suffolk, in that part of its area included within the metropolitan district, had, in 1920, about 25,000 people. In 1930 it has 44,000, a gain of nearly 78 per cent. No gold rush can compare in magnitude or in significance with this exodus of population from the older parts of New York, this inrush from other sections.

If we take account only of the places where people sleep, the centre of gravity in the region has been shifted swiftly and almost violently eastward. Manhattan no longer has a guest room or a spare couch. Hundreds of thousands who look to the little island for the sources of their incomes have rebelled against the rigorous living conditions which it imposes. While statesmen were lying awake nights worrying over the rush from the country to the city there was a backward surge, certainly of equal significance, from real city life to the semi-rural life of the suburbs.

Richmond, Westchester and the New Jersey counties have a similar story to tell, though the movements in those directions are less in magnitude. The rocky hills above the northern shore of Long Island Sound have never been remarkable for their fertility, but as suburban territory for a world city they are almost ideal. Into Westchester, between 1920 and 1930, thronged some 173,000 new residents, most of them commuters, bringing the population to a total of more than 516,000. That part of Fairfield County which is inside the district grew from 98,000 to 137,000, or nearly 39 per cent. On the southwest the borough of Richmond, handicapped by inadequate transportation service, grew from 116,000 to more than 156,000.

On the New Jersey side Bergen County added 73.8 per cent to its population, Union County 52.2 per cent, Morris County 34.1 per cent, Middlesex 30 per cent, Somerset 25.5 per cent and the other counties in somewhat smaller proportions. Rockland County, N. Y., with a population of but 325 to the square mile, grew from 45,000 to 59,000. Hudson County, already densely settled in 1920 and with a present density of 11,000 persons to the square mile—more than any other division of the district outside of Manhattan, Brooklyn and the Bronx—almost stood still. It gained but 8.4 per cent. The new tides of settlement are passing it by for the same reasons that they are receding from Manhattan. Beyond the noise and dust of the city lies a fairer country.

Lines of Growth.

With the help of these facts and figures we can lay in some new broad strokes on our metropolitan pattern. The city—using that term to cover the whole area—is doing what it has always been doing, it is growing away from the centre. But instead of following certain streets, such as Broadway, Fifth Avenue or Madison Avenue, as it used to do, it is now following the transportation lines—first the subways, elevated lines and tubes, then, as growth reaches further out, the commuting lines. The increasing concentration of population in upper Manhattan, the Bronx and Queens is largely a subway product; that in Nassau, Suffolk, Westchester and the outlying New Jersey counties a matter of commuting service on surface railways. If Rockland County gains only 30 per cent and the borough of Richmond only 34 per cent, while Westchester gains 52 per cent, the latter result is of course due to a great extent to the greater ease of access. It is only the exceptional commuter who will follow the line of greatest-resistance, in order that he may at last shake the crowd from his heels and burst forth into relative solitude.

The railroad passenger totals show where the crowd has gone in its effort to get away from itself. The enormous jump in passenger traffic on the Long Island Railroad since 1920 tells the history of a boom. In 1920 the total was a little under 60,000,000 for the year; in 1929 it was more than 85,000,000. The Lackawanna and the Erie made slower, though marked progress. The gains of the New Haven were surprisingly small, though the New York, Westchester & Boston, serving some of the same territory, went up from 4,442,000 to 9,326,000. The New York Central's total passenger traffic rose from 28,717,000 in 1920 to 44,538,000 in 1929. The grand total of commuting traffic on all lines, including ferries, was about 252,000,000 for 1920 and about 428,000,000 for 1929.

We do not even have to go as far back as 1920 to record an enormous extension of the commuting habit. In 1928, according to the estimates of the Transit Commission, about 200,000 persons daily commuted in and out of the city by railroaad or ferry. In 1929 the number was in the neighborhood of 280,000. This figure, of course, leaves the subway patrons out of account. It leaves out, also, those who enter the city in vehicles. By ferry and tunnel nearly 23,000,000 vehicles went in or out of the city in 1929—nearly 11,000,000 using the Holland tunnels alone. But a gain of 80,000 or more commuters a year will run up to 1,000,000 in a little over twelve years, and 1,000,000 commuters, plus their families, are not to be sneezed at, even in metropolitan New York. Moreover, the commuting habit is likely to grow more rapidly in the future, not less rapidly. Perhaps New York is just beginning to move out of town.

Changing Manhattan.

What of Manhattan while these majestic shifts of population were going on? Except on Sundays and holidays, and then only in certain portions of the island, such as the Wall Street section, the observer will not notice any diminution of activity. Instead, during the business hours of any working day he will find a fierce intensification. The daytime population of Manhattan has increased roughly in proportion to the number of persons entering the city by all means of conveyance. The same thing is true of downtown Brooklyn. The commuting figures in the previous paragraphs have to do with the places where people sleep, dance, play bridge and tend their gardens. But they do not reflect an actual scattering of the workaday population; they show, rather, an increasing concentration. The overcrowding of streets and other public places is intensified, not diminished, when a former Manhattanite moves his chattels to East Orange, Oyster Bay or Greenwich. For crowding in New York is not produced by people who stay in one spot. It is produced by people moving about, not merely in the city itself, but to and from the city.

Manhattan, therefore, reveals to the casual eye, between 9 o'clock or earlier in the morning and 5 or later in the afternoon, not the slightest symptom of depopulation. It changes, indeed. Old glories depart and new ones come. There are remarkable shifts in the industrial complexion of the island, such as the development of the Garment Centre near Seventh Avenue in the latitude of Thirty-fourth Street. The heavier industries tend to move toward the outskirts. Many business houses have offices and sales rooms within easy reach of the Grand Central and Pennsylvania Stations, with warehouses and factories further out. Department stores sell many of their bulkier goods by samples, filling orders from remote warehouses. The financial district sticks to its old location near Wall Street but its own branch offices and those of some of its satellites are becoming more numerous uptown. Great new towers top the old skyline above the Battery but they are outdone by their soaring rivals along the belt between Thirty-fourth Street and the Grand Central Zone. And many a shining roof that would be a landmark in a smaller city goes almost unnoticed here.

Underneath the imposing skylines the human make-up of the working city changes, too. The white collar employes are multiplying. New York does less manual labor than it used. But to make up for the lack there are more figures to be added, more letters to be written, more orders to be checked up. To take a single example, the city has, or had two or three years ago, some 1,000 publications. The time and energy spent in running these enterprises would saw a great deal of wood or tan a great deal of leather if it were applied in those directions. Manual labor naturally goes into the making of fine jewelry, millinery, ladies' handbags and the more expensive kinds of cigars and cigarettes, but it is not the kind of labor that can be picked up on any street corner. Skill and intelligence are worth more than strength.

Quality Also Alters.

So New York is not only altering in shape and quantity. It is also altering in a qualitative way. If we look closely at the human texture of the district we find great differences in race and age according to the locality chosen. Manhattan, for example, has three times as many residents of foreign extraction as has East Orange, and about one in every ten of its population is between the ages of 20 and 24, as compared with one in thirteen for East Orange. The great metropolitan spectacle grows in complexity the more closely one looks at it.

But what of the city of the future, as we see it as we sight along the base line of the past decade? Certain changes are inevitable, because they are already being planned and prepared for. New Jersey has yet to receive its share of the population of the region. The Hudson River Bridge, now under construction, and the Hudson Vehicular Tunnel at Thirty-eight Street, approved in principle though not yet contracted for, will send much travel westward. The Narrows Tunnel, when constructed will open up Staten Island and by means of existing bridges or the Kill van Kull Bridge, now under construction, will furnish new means of getting to Central and Southern New Jersey. As the eastern and northeastern areas fill up the commuters will undoubtedly turn more and more toward the west. The Hudson will be no longer the barrier that it has been. The New Jersey section of the district—2,277 square miles out of a total of 3,765—will become an integral part.

Manhattan, all the indications are, will remain the great daytime centre. Finance, retail trade, professional services and commercial recreation will reach their highest and finest heights there. The island will, however, continue to decline as a sleeping place. But meanwhile the importance of Brooklyn, with its preponderance of population, will grow, and if the students of regional problems are correct there will be great centres in the Bronx and in Hudson County, excelling the Manhattan of a few years ago and excelled only by the existing Manhattan. If we could look down from an airplane, seeing the ordinary visible highways, waterways, railways, masses of buildings and areas of country that are still uncongested or even uninhabited, this impressive future would be clear to our eyes.

Great and Steady Growth.

The great design is taking shape with every passing day. The growth of the district extends itself along the natural avenues of access, like water spilled in the dust or a drop of ink folded into a sheet of paper. These avenues have long run east, northeast and west. Now there begin to arise concentric lines crossing the radiating ones. Already the subways of Brooklyn and Queens are being planned so that a great arc will be created, with residential sections at both ends and subways in the middle. New Jersey will some day have a similar system of rapid transit lines. Industries and "satellite towns" will be strung like beads on the great iron necklaces which will enlace Manhattan. And with that the commuting area will be pushed further out, since an increasing number of people will be able to reach their jobs without penetrating the geographical inner circle.

Such are the tendencies the census shows us at work. The mighty shuttles, carrying the countless threads of tangled human lives, that now weave so thunderously across Manhattan may not abate their motion in any predictable future. But their sweep is widening year by year and the intricacy of their pattern is increasing. The metropolitan district, richer and more populous than some famous empires, employing a million workers in its industries alone, creating annually nearly four billion dollars' worth of industrial wealth alone, is in a manner still in its infancy.

SITE OF OLD ITHACA IS SOUGHT ANEW

Excavations on Ionian Isle May Lead to Finding of Homeric City Ruled by Odysseus

By PATRICK BALFOUR.

AN expedition is being prepared for the purpose of discovering the site of ancient Ithaca, long a subject of controversy among archaeologists. This was the Greek city which, according to Homer, the crafty Odysseus sought to reach for ten weary years after the fall of Troy and within whose walls his faithful wife, Penelope, held off the many persistent suitors for her hand. The excavations are to be made under the direction of the British School of Athens, and Sir Rennell Rodd, former British Ambassador at Rome, has sponsored the appeal for funds to undertake the work.

The controversy regarding the city of Ithaca falls into two divisions. In the first place, it is by no means agreed that the city was located on the modern island of the same name. Dr. W. Dörpfeld, a German archaeologist, has suggested that ancient Ithaca should be identified as the modern Levkas, another of the Ionian islands just north of modern Ithaca, or Thiaki. At times it has been believed to have been Cephalonia, to the southwest, and Corfu, far to the north.

The other part of the controversy deals with the location of the ancient city on the island of Ithaca—if it actually is there.

Homeric scholars had long been worried by an apparently meaningless idiom frequently used in the Odyssey in addressing travelers: "In what ship did you come, since I cannot suppose that you came on foot?" Dr. Dörpfeld points out that Levkas is separated from the mainland by a lagoon such as a poor traveler would ford on foot, while the better sort would take a boat. The question would then read as a characteristic piece of archaic good manners. This point was almost the best weapon in Dörpfeld's armament, and very ingenious it is.

But M. Bérard, a French critic who upholds the traditional view, has remarked that Ithaca is an island of so many barren hills that only a man who could not afford a boat would care to traverse it on foot from coast to coast, while Sir Rennell Rodd quotes evidence that an identical phrase is used to this day by the inhabitants of Capri, which certainly cannot be reached from the mainland on foot.

This example will serve to demonstrate on what a high level of exactitude the controversy has been conducted. But however skillful the debate may be, there will always be a profound cleavage between those who regard the Odyssey as a historical document in which the slightest deviation from obvious accuracy must at all costs be explained away, and those who regard it as the greatest piece of literature in the world, based no doubt on facts, but full of imagination and fancy.

Ithaca's Topography.

But within the island even the traditionalists disagree in choosing their site. The two extremities of Ithaca are linked together by an isthmus so narrow and mountainous as to divide the island virtually into two. A number of Greek scholars, led by Professor Oikonomos, insist that the capital must be sought in the southern portion, while Sir Rennell Rodd, guided once more by tradition, maintains that it can only be in the northern half, on the spot known to this day as Polls—the natural designation of a Greek capital. Once again each party can produce a formidable array of verbal proofs. And equally neither is likely to advance very far without getting down to the simple facts which excavation will, it is hoped, reveal.

Ithaca is, of course, not entirely new ground for the archaeologist, but previous efforts have been singularly ill-directed. More than a century ago Leake was engaged in unsystematic digging in various parts of the island. Schliemann, whose discovery of Troy places him unquestionably among the first rank of archaeologists, initiated some digging on the summit of the mountain which dominates the isthmus; but exactly what he hoped to find remains uncertain, since the capital cannot have been situated in such a spot unless Homer was entirely unfamiliar with the geography of his own story—a suggestion which Bérard and Sir Rennell Rodd reject without hesitation.

Fortunately the traditionalists have the courage of their convictions, and have initiated a proper and systematic excavation of the site they favor, an excavation which is likely to provide far more than the mere confirmation of a theory. Hitherto nothing has been found by any one to prove more than that the island was at one time in Mycenean occupation. There are numerous tombs conforming to the well-known Mycenean pattern and an undoubtedly Mycenean sword has been unearthed on the slopes of Mount Aeto. But these discoveries have been merely incidental to the efforts of various archaeologists to prove their own particular theories. These attempts fall under three headings.

The first is M. Oikonomos's attempt to prove that Odysseus's city is in the southern half of the island, on the promontory of Vathy. This is not yet completed.

The Work of Schliemann.

The second is Schliemann's work on Mount Aeto, the mountain on the isthmus. There is no denying the importance of his discoveries. He claims to have found 190 dwellings and that there was room enough on his site for 2,000. Leake before him had shown beyond question that the slope of the mountain had been a fortified stronghold from the earliest times.

The third theory is superficially far the most attractive. M. Bérard and Sir Rennell Rodd are men who not merely know but love the Odyssey. The careful reconstructions they have made respectively in "Les Phéniciens et l'Odysée" and "Homer's Ithaca" show a spirit of reverent scholarship as opposed to pedantic criticism. These scholars see no sound reason why the traditional designation of either the island or the city should ever have been challenged; they have found for themselves a number of striking coincidences between the story and the reality. It is to prove that their geography is also Homer's that these excavations have been undertaken.

CORN BORERS AT WORK

"OLFACTOMETER" TO TRAP CORN BORERS

Machine for Determining Odors Favored by Pest Is to Be Used in the Fight on Insect

AT the United States Corn Borer Laboratory maintained in Arlington, Mass., by the Department of Agriculture, Bureau of Entomology, is a curious machine called an "olfactometer," which has been developed after three years of experimentation and research into the habits of that insect pest, the European corn borer. This insect, believed to have been introduced into this country and first discovered in New England in 1917, has already cost the farmers, truck gardeners and florists of the country millions of dollars. The government has spent other millions in its attempt to eradicate the pest, or at least to control it.

The "olfactometer" is used to determine the odors that will attract the moth of the corn borer. This moth lays the eggs that hatch into larvae which eat not only the stalks and the grain but even the husks and silk of the growing corn. They also attack many other field crops and garden plants, such as beets, rhubarb, celery, beans, oats, peppers, spinach, gladiola, chrysanthemums, dahlias and many others. The apparatus consists of a T-shaped arrangement of galvanized iron pipes ten inches in diameter, each of the T-ends being curved and extended so that the arms are about the length of the T upright.

When an experiment with the corn borer moth is going on the air in the room where the olfactometer is located is maintained at [illegible] degrees Fahrenheit. Air that is filtered, warmed and highly saturated with moisture is then conducted by flexible metal tubes into each of the T arms, which are wholly dark within (the corn borer moth flies only in the dark) and when there is considerable dew in the air). Conditions inside the tubes are made to duplicate ideal conditions for activities of the moth. There is just the faintest draft of air coming in through each of the sleeves of the "T," passing up these sleeves and finally out through an opening at the base of the T upright. Here, at this opening, the moth is placed.

In one sleeve is a bit of blotting paper on which has been placed a drop of the odor used for experiment. The other sleeve is empty. The moth is left to choose where it shall go, and it has been learned that the moths will go into the sleeve where certain odors placed at certain times attract them. These odors include those distilled from juice of various parts of the corn plant and from such weeds as wormwort.

In the course of the studies some 900 other odors have been developed and much new information has been obtained with respect to odor reactions and effects upon the human sensory system. The experiments are based upon the proved fact that the corn borer moth flies only at night, hence must be attracted by odors from the cornfield or from the other fields of plants which it infests. In addition to the collection of odors, aside from those distilled from juices of the ear, tassels, husks and stalk of the corn plant, it has been found that nothing in the world is without its distinctive odor, and no part of the world is odorless, according to Dr. C. N. Batchelder, associate entomologist at the laboratory.

Combined Odors Preferred.

Experiments with the olfactometer indicate that the corn borer prefers a combination of three or more odors to any one, such as it would get from a field of corn, and will follow up through the sleeves of the instrument to where the odor has been dropped on a piece of blotter. As a result, the workers, particularly the field scouts, who are out trapping corn borer moths for experimental purposes, are saved much time and the government much money in locating fields that have been invaded, by decoying the moths away from the fields to the traps. Thus a single man can do the work that would otherwise require twenty-five men in field work.

The Department of Agriculture began its work of finding means of exterminating the corn borer shortly after it was discovered in badly infested New England cornfields. The pest has already spread over some 500,000 square miles of the country, with resultant loss of many millions of dollars to farmers and others. It has just barely reached the great Western corn belt and into Canada. Should it spread through that vast territory, the losses would run up into the hundreds of millions annually.

Preyed On by Parasites.

The corn borer, in its native European habitat, was kept down in numbers by various parasites that prey upon it. "Immigrating" to this country, it was free to work its will unmolested, for the parasites did not accompany it, and none were on hand in this country to attack it at first. To fight it, the department entomologists had to import parasites from Europe that were known to attack the corn borer, and propagate them. They further had to begin literally from the ground up to study the insect and learn its habits. At the Arlington laboratory are kept, fed and housed, some 4,000,000 corn borers, in all stages of development, from the egg, the larvae and the grub to the fully developed moth. They are being propagated to become "hosts" for parasites, of which several kinds have been discovered, including some imported species. Some of these savagely attack the corn borer pest, which has eaten its way through New England, New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana and Michigan.

The corn borer is known to attack and feed upon as many as 200 different crops, including cotton and sugar cane, so that it is a tremendous menace to the south as well as the Eastern States and the Middle West. One cornstalk alone has been found to contain as high as 117 corn borer grubs, while out of seventy-five stalks pulled from seventeen hills of corn, the average was forty-six to the plant. At this rate one could calculate 1,000,000 or more to the acre. And the female moth will lay as high as 1,000 eggs in two weeks, with the average around 300 eggs.

GREATEST SKYSCRAPER RISES ON A CLOCKWORK SCHEDULE

The Empire State Building Soars Upward, as a Modern Army Daily Defeats Time, Far Above the Throngs on Fifth Avenue

The Empire State Building as It Will Appear When Completed.

By C. G. POORE.

A BUILDING that will hold a population of some 20,000 people is rising on two acres of ground at the Fifth Avenue corner where the old Waldorf-Astoria Hotel used to stand. The Empire State Building will be about 200 feet taller than the highest existing skyscraper, and it will be the largest office building in the world. Today, with the steel skeleton for nearly half its eighty-five stories already in place and with all the amazing multitude of corollary operations in full career, it presents a remarkable picture of the building of a skyscraper.

Looking up from the street level one sees several exterior stages of the operation. The dark mass of steel squares at the top is already giving way to the gray stone facing, lined with shining strips of metal that form the outstanding feature of the decoration. The first four or five stories above the street are still open; but even as one watches derrick-slings begin to carry the long slabs of stone facing to the proper floors and they will soon be inclosed. High up on the wall the board walk the masons use hangs like a yellow girdle around the building.

From the top derricks swing out over the street, and the riveters can be heard but not seen. Across the sidewalk lumbering double-wheeled trucks move through the three gateways that lead to the twilight and humming confusion of the first floor.

Following one of the trucks an observer finds himself in a forest of concrete covered piers. Here there is an infinity of operations. Truckloads of brick are being unloaded with a roar as the truck chassis tips up and the load goes thundering down through the floor into a basement hopper. Truckloads of tile are unloaded more gingerly, by hand. Sheet-iron, metal parts, bales of wire and coils of cable, sand and cinders and lumber and pipe arrive. Each is unloaded in a special corner of the block-wide floor, presently to go shooting up in elevators to the floor where each is needed.

Some Staggering Figures.

The building of the skyscraper represents an investment of $50,000,000 and all other figures are in proportion. More than 50,000 tons of steel, 10,000,000 bricks, and 200,000 cubic feet of stone will be used before the frame is completed. There will be seventy-five miles of water mains and 2,000,000 feet of electric light and power wiring. Every day 16,000 partition tiles are brought in by truck, as well as 5,000 bags of cement, 450 cubic yards of sand and 300 bags of lime.

More than 3,000 men are daily at work. Going through the building today one encounters them on all floors. Among them are 225 carpenters, 290 bricklayers, 384 brick laborers, 328 arch laborers, 107 derrick men. On the structural steel 285 men are working, while 249 other men are installing the elevators and 105 are doing electrical work. There are 192 plumbers, 194 heating and ventilating men, as well as many trade specialists, inspectors, checkers, foremen, clerks and water boys. Even the dust on the planked wooden floor where the trucks arrive requires men to settle it with watering cans.

So great is the concentration of work that many of the men do not even descend to the street for their midday meals. A concessionnaire runs restaurants at various levels of the building, obviating the long climb down and up again, through the maze of moving equipment and working men.

Each floor has a miniature railway system, equipped with cars that carry materials from the central work elevator shafts to the outposts of the floor where cement and brick and metal are used. These cars run on tracks equipped with turntables so that they can be shifted and shunted in any direction.

How is this gargantuan volume of work coordinated? R. H. Shreve of the firm of Shreve, Lamb & Harmon, architects of the Empire State Building, answered the question.

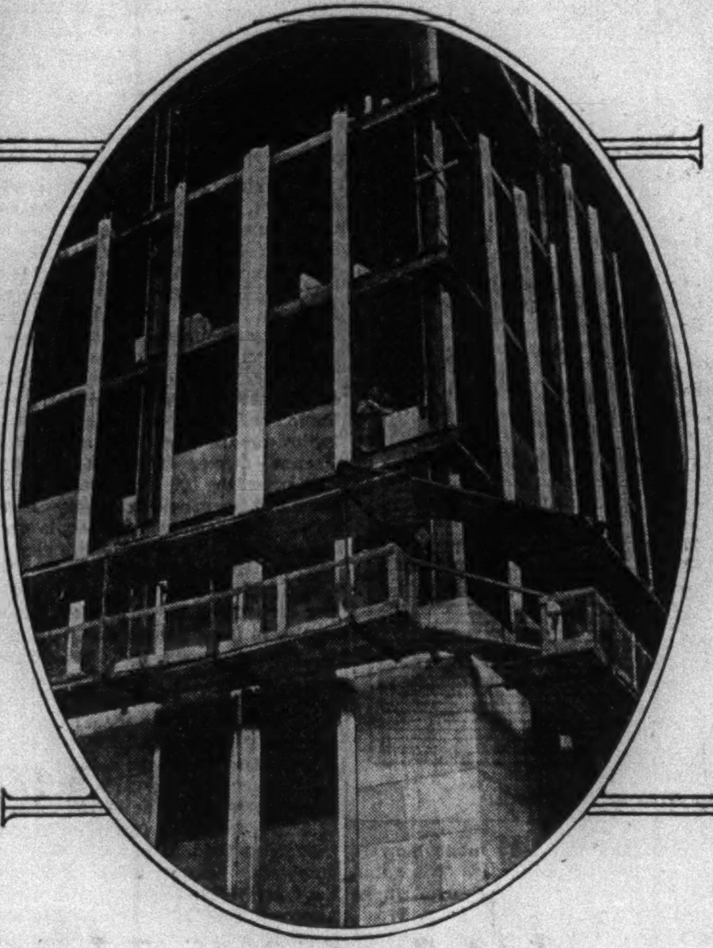
"One may well believe," Mr. Shreve said, "that with its organized cooperation in the labor of men and the fabrication and placing of materials, its precision of performance to match the timing of a trunkline railroad and connecting services, almost the powers of Aladdin's genii were harnessed for a building project. None of all the ancient world wonders in any way matched the amazing assembly of skilled craft and fashioned materials which with uncanny accuracy find their places in the daily wrought miracle of a modern skyscraper.

"The first actual step in the building of a skyscraper is the selection of the site. The situation of the building and the cost of the land are, of course, vitally important in the paramount consideration of whether the building is going to pay for itself and earn money on the investment or not. It is therefore a prime requisite that the design shall distribute the cost of the land over the largest practical area of usable floor surface set up in accordance with building cost, building laws and profitable use—all influences which must receive our consideration.

Preliminary Considerations.

"To set up properly an income-producing building, the control of its design and construction should be in the hands of a board on which sit owner, banker, builder, architect, engineers and real estate men. The record of their decisions finds place in plans, specifications and contracts, financial transactions and leases, and the outcome of their work, if it is to be successful, must have been foreseen far in advance of its realization."

Driven relentlessly by the necessity for speed, the designers make these plans so that work can begin on the lower part of the skyscraper before the specifications for higher sections have been completed. A construction program was developed in the case of the Empire State Building requiring a synchronization of infinitely varied activities scarcely attempted before.



Detail of Construction, Showing Vertical Lines of Chrome-Nickel Trim and Cast Aluminum Spandrels.

Here is a picture of the project as drawn by Mr. Shreve in words. At the beginning excavation in the rock far below the level of the street went on for twenty-four hours a day. Foundations were placed at one side of the property as the steam shovels and drills carried on at the other. Meantime steel columns—some weighing well over a ton to each foot of their length—and girders and beams finished to a sixteenth of an inch were in various stages of progress at mill and shop or stored, ready for delivery, at the Jersey yard.

The endless caravan of supply trucks held some loads waiting to cross the river; others were struggling to reach Fifth Avenue and Thirty-fourth Street through New York's clogged one-way traffic; and still others were already there, unloading. High above the street great bundles of steel at the ends of cobweb cables now swing toward the working platform where metal members of the structure lie in orderly rows, waiting to be set in place by the men at the top. Just below the topmost steel as it is set in place are the riveters, securing the lower members in place. They climb to their perches by ladders or along steel work.

The Order of Progress.

But just below the riveters are the stairways, already rising through the frame. And lower down on many levels are festoons of electric cables and steel pipes, "the veins and arteries attaching to the steel skeleton." Flooring, exterior walls and windows, elevator shafts, ornamental stonework and all the finishing trades follow in such a rapidly moving but orderly parade, Mr. Shreve said, that the plaster may appear in the lower floors before the roof has been made tight.

This whole intricate procession is illustrated graphically on the progress schedule, a chart whose inflexible lines tell precisely when each process must begin and end, as well as its exceedingly important time relation to everything else going on in the building. In order to make the building process an economic success it must be ready by May 1, 1931. April 1, therefore, is set as the deadline on building operations. The progress chart is ruled off according to months from February, 1930, to April, 1931. Structural steel work begins in March and ends in September. Closely following it comes the line for the exterior walls, which began to appear in the middle of May and must be completed by the end of November.

The whole effect is that of a chase up into the sky, with the steel workers going first and all the other trades following madly after them. Thus the interior partitioning starts in June and ends on Feb. 1. The metal window frames begin to appear in May and are all in place by the end of December. The elevator inclosures are under way from the middle of May to the end of March and the building of the mail chutes parallels that progress. Painting and decorating begin in March and continue until the building is ready for occupancy. The various plumbing and electrical fixtures progress from the rough work of the putting in of the ganglia to the installation of the final fixtures. Even the revolving doors are accounted for on the chart. Work on them begins in December and ends just as the first tenants are ready to use them.

Due not only to this intricately coordinated schedule but to several important innovations in building, the Empire State is being erected more cheaply, it is said, than could have been possible under the older systems of construction. Outstanding among these is the method of treating the windows and the wall details around them.

There are to be 6,400 windows in the structure and more than 4,000 of them are in the tower walls. What treatment of these many openings in the vast expanse of wall would best retain and express solidity of mass, avoid giving the impression of a perforated shell, add dignity to utility and escape the inherently monotonous gridiron of oft repeated floors crossed by the slotted vertical bands of uniformly spaced windows?

This, Mr. Lamb explained, was the problem. The answer, he said, had many phases, the most striking of which was the decision to place the glass of the windows outside the face of the wall and so to eliminate the customary reveals with their attendant assertive shadows.

"It is true," said Mr. Lamb, "that tradition would lead us to believe that an expression of thickness of wall conveys an impression of strength of structure. But how convincing would be a reveal of four or even eight inches in a masonry wall 1,000 feet high and 200 feet wide? Would not the mass of the building seem a more sturdy form if its outer shell or covering, for such only it is, were recognized and treated as a wrapping and not as a load-bearing structural element? And would not their appearance be more satisfying if the protective coverings of the openings for light and air were placed over, or outside of, and not within the borders of these openings?

Design Speeds Erection.

"We may very well withhold judgment on the success of this arrangement viewed as the solution of a problem in design and await the test of execution; but it would seem possible to reach a conclusion at this time as to the merits of the construction from the point of view of good sense, usefulness and economy—and, above all, the opportunity for more rapid erection. The instant approval given it by the builders and by the engineers and sub-contractors in the several trades involved has helped us in our decision to adopt it in the construction of the building."

As a result of this new arrangement of the windows so that the panes are a part of the wall, the stone-work has been simplified and its cost very much reduced. Under the older system, the stone for window sills and frames has to be set in place with more stone imbedded in the structure of the building for balance than shows on the outside. This new method has eliminated not only the cost and weight of the stone so used, but has also made the stone that is used of a much simpler form. The result is that the building is speeded up and the stone is ready ahead of time. Metal spandrels are used in place of the customary masonry spandrels, so the stone face carries up for heights of from 500 to 700 feet.

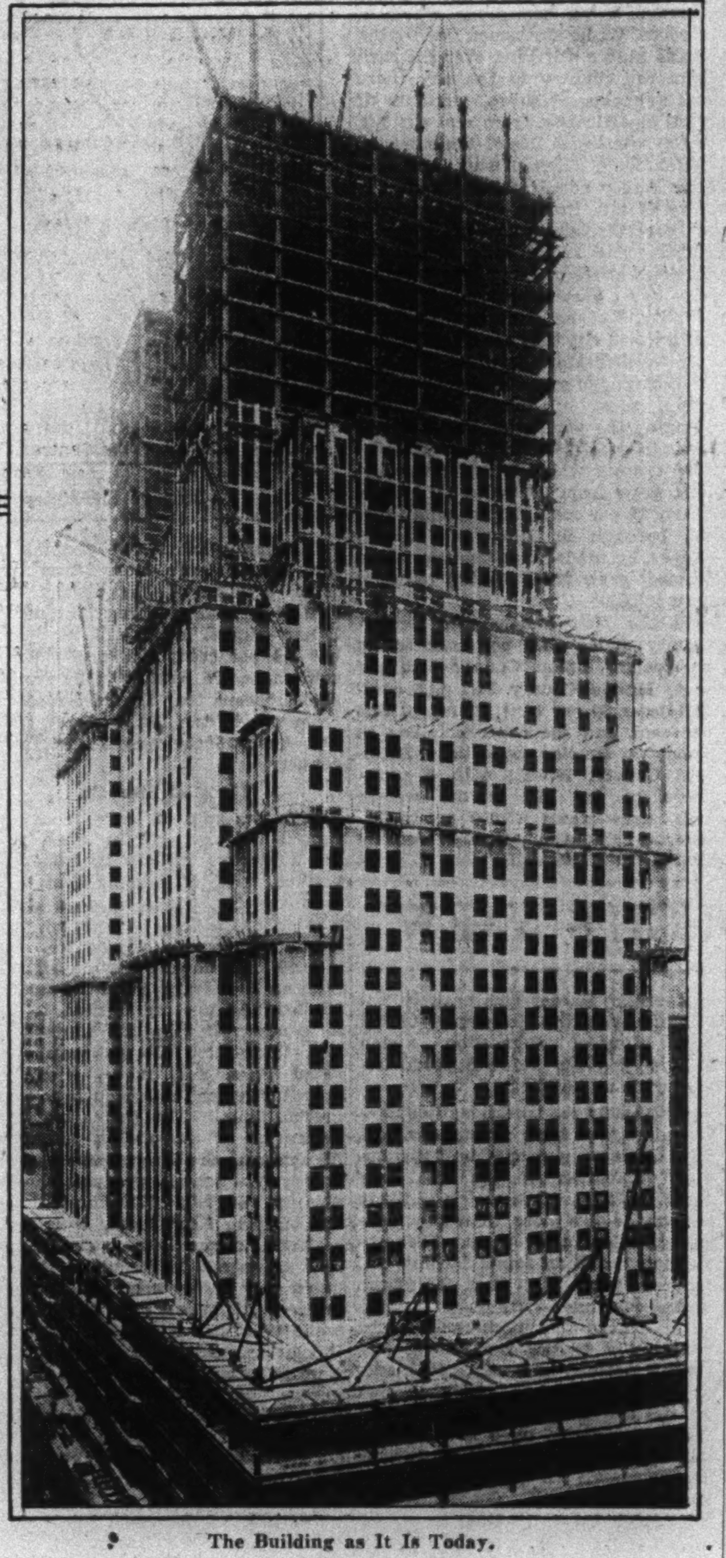
Most buildings with stone exteriors have about one cubic foot of stone for each forty-five or fifty feet of building. The Empire State, as a result of this innovation, will have only one cubic foot of stone for each 200 feet of building, and even this, due to the simplicity of the design, will cost less than the average for stone. On the inside of the building there will be a great saving of rentable space because all heating equipment will be placed within the thickness of the wall, with radiators concealed behind metal fronts.

The Factors of Success.

"The construction of the Empire State Building within the time set for its completion," Mr. Shreve said, "has been, like every other great task, dependent on the successful execution of many detail operations, failure in respect to any one of which would render impossible the carrying out of the full program in the allotted time. Well up among the conditions contributing to success in this case must be placed the working out and the use of this modified window-spandrel-wall construction."

Former Governor Smith, who is president of Empire State, Inc., announced last week that the total height of the building, from the sidewalk to the tip of the famous Zeppelin mooring mast, will be 1,222 feet, the equivalent of 102 stories. According to Mr. Smith, a large observation gallery will be built on the eighty-sixth floor, which can be reached by two elevators connecting with the main elevators of the building at the eightieth floor.

This unusual gallery, raised above the roof level, will be sheathed with nickel and steel and glass. Its floor will be 1,048 feet above Fifth Avenue and will be 108 by 65 feet, large enough to hold several hundred persons.



The Building as It Is Today.

MEXICO PLANS DREDGING OF SACRED CENOTE

Well at Chichen Itza Is Said to Be Rich in Objects Sacrificed to the Rain God Chac

By EMMA REH STEVENSON.

MEXICO CITY.

THE most sensational project in the field of Mexican archeology is the proposed dredging of the sacred Cenote, the sacrificial well of Chichen Itza, Yucatan.

Competent investigators, Americans and others, from time to time apply for permission to the Mexican Government to undertake this project, submitting curious and ingenuous schemes for accomplishing it. But so far they have always got no for an answer.

Early in the present century, before Mexico fully realized the importance of keeping her archeological treasures at home, an American Consul, resident in Yucatan for many years, had been mud-dipping in the sacred well, getting human bones and many curious and valuable objects in gold, jade and turquoise, which had been donated in the long gone past to the Rain God Chac oy Mexican and Central American Indians

Since then Mexico has strictly prohibited the carrying off of her archeological treasures, although idol-running gangs ply their trade, selling real and spurious archeological objects to willing buyers.

This well has certainly inspired more romantic and adventurous novels, poems and lies, than any body of water twice its size. But when one sits by the jungle's edge, on the rim of the old sacrificial altar that overhangs the green pool fifty feet below, and thinks that this still water is from sixty to seventy-five feet deep and that under that is a twenty-five-foot layer of soft ooze rich in virgins' jawbones and contributions of gold, jade and turquoise, it is easy to ruminate further. Such a well must have the proper background, especially if one has come all the way to Yucutan to write or tell about it.

The traveler, often hacking his way with a machete—the Yucatecan machete is shaped like a sharp steel question mark—through the thick tropical brush, must make the blood curdle by the casual reference to the garrapatas that burrow in the flesh and hatch their eggs there, the spotted tigers that slink across the broken idols of stone half-hidden in the fan-palms and the deadly serpents that dangle from the trees.

The fact that Mexican señoritas and their mammas always come out to Chichen Itza in ridiculously high-heeled shoes and silk stockings and lots of fringe, without catcihng a thread or a garrapata, while Yucatecan tigers at least have too much sense to come out into the clearings where people are always nosing around, are facts that do not have to be mentioned. And if one really wants to see a snake, he would have to take up his residence in Yucatan and wait till fate favored him with such a vision, if ever.

Explorers Often Disappointed.

Professional explorers find Yucatan tame as far as adventure goes, though there is plenty of physical discomfort to be found. A typical disappointment in Yucatan is to arrive at a place where one is sure no one has ever been before, and find cod-liver oil signs tacked up on the trees.

But the peninsula nevertheless provides such a strong contrast to everyday American life, and even life in the rest of Mexico, that though the element of danger bold travelers pretend to seek here is actually missing, romance and color are not. A simple cenote, for example, does not have to be sacred in order to be worth looking at. In fact, the entire subject of water in Yucatan is very curious and paradoxical.

Although there is apparently not a drop of it to be seen in the entire State, there is plenty of it everywhere. There are no surface rivers, streams or brooks, but everywhere under the limestone crust of the ground it circulates slowly and mysteriously. This underground water is so hard and limy that if one washes one's head in it every hair when dry will stand up. Rainwater is therefore saved and used for drinking. The subterranean formation is a coral reef honeycombed by circulating water and absorbing all rainwater immediately. Wells may be sunk most anywhere. Every other house in Yucatan has its creaking windmill pumping water constantly by the wind that always blows in from the sea, and smaller villages and towns have them proportionally.

Here and there underground streams or lakes break into caverns and grottoes which are countless in Yucatan. A cenote is such an underground pool hidden away from the sun in a cave, or far below the vertical rim of some great pothole broken in the limestone crust above. The water is always in slow motion, a fact which is sometimes demonstrated by a leaf which makes the trip across in perhaps the course of an afternoon. It is believed that many of these cenotes are interconnected, and Dr. Gaumer, a scientist resident in Izamal for many years, said he had seen small alligators disappear out of one cenote and reappear mysteriously in another far away.

Many strange tales exist about cenotes. In one near Mani sits an old woman who kidnaps children and feeds them to a great plumed serpent which guards her underground. At another cenote near Tabi a beautiful palm tree appears on the water at midday, while at a third, at Tecoh, thirty miles from Mérida, one must not even breathe while entering or drawing the water, for the slightest noise poisons the air, and many Indians have died thereof. No one ever goes swimming or even sticks his toe in the water of a certain cenote east of Santa Cruz de Bravo in Quintana Roo, because a boy was once drawn under by some mysterious force and never heard of again.

There are many beautiful cenotes in Yucatan that would fit any Arabian Nights tale. On the road to Uxmal there is the cenote of Mucuyché, whose crystal pool upon a bed of white limestone rock, among gleaming stalagmites and stalactites, so enchanted the explorer Stephens in 1847 that he exclaimed that no Greek poet could imagine anything more beautiful. It was fit only for Diana and her nymphs to bathe in, he said.

The Village Well.

In Telchaquillo, thirty miles from Mérida, women cross the apparently level plaza of the village, with water jars on their hips, and suddenly disappear, while others mysteriously rise out of the earth. For a moment one thinks it is a heat illusion, but on approach a great hole opens in the earth and irregular steps cut and worn into the rock lead far down to a still pool of water 500 feet from the entrance of the cavern. At this point the limestone roof is sixty feet high.

Many cenotes on the great henequen haciendas have been "improved" by the hand of man, by the addition of colored electric lights in the water and out, diving boards, dressing rooms, tea tables, or underground banquet halls cut into the clean white limestone rock.

which once again restores the equilibrium.

Such "faults" are very common, as may be observed from their surface indications in nearly all regions, and imply the ceaseless operations of enormous forces inside the earth's crust. The source of the stresses may possibly be the shrinking of the earth's interior away from the superstructure by reason of cooling, or the "extrusion of igneous matter," or the escape of gases.

While the cause is not definitely known, the immedate effects are very apparent. When fissures are once opened they may serve repeatedly to relieve stresses. For example, the last California earthquake is traceable to the recurrence of displacement along the San Andreas fault previously marked out by other movements as a prominent topographic feature in the coast region from Benito County on the southwest to Humboldt County on the northwest.

On the opposite sides of the fault plane the strata shifted horizontally a distance ranging from seven or eight feet up to twenty-one feet. In places, also, there was a vertical movement of from one to three feet. As the total length of the fault is estimated at 270 miles, the momentum of the mass involved must have been enormous.

The tectonic earthquakes are the most numerous and probably account for nearly all disasters of seismic origin. The volcanic earthquakes are traceable to concussions within the volcanic conduit, produced probably by the gases in their progress toward the surface. Most of the imprisoned energy, of course, finds release in the eruption.

A further cause of earthquakes, generally regarded, however, as not very important, is found in the jars produced by the collapse of caverns that have been hollowed out by underground waters in their circulation through soluble rock materials like limestone, gypsum and rock salt.

ENDURANCE CONTESTS SWEEP ON IN CYCLES

Recent Outbreak of Tree-Sitting Recalls Other Freak Events That Have Stirred Young Imaginations

BOYS and girls but recently graduated from the pinafore class are perched in trees or atop poles in public parks and backyards in all sections of the country. They are not viewing the scenery nor are they spying out the land. They and the youthful non-stop bicycle riders have been bitten by the craze for endurance records.

Freak contests such as these seem to run in cycles. Every few years an unusual stunt by some professional seeking publicity fires the imagination of thousands of people and thus a large number jump into the game striving to emulate if not surpass the achievement. A decade ago Charleston and Black Bottom dancing was the rage. This was followed by the dance marathon which became epidemic from Tangiers and Timbuctoo to Paris and Nome until State, county and municipal authorities interfered with drastic police regulations.

In grandfather's day it was considered quite a trick to eat a quail a day for thirty days and every now and then some daring soul, stoked by a reckless stomach, essayed the feat and gloried in the title of champion. With quails as scarce as they are now, this seems today not only a harmless but perhaps a delectable pastime.

Records for Staying Aloft.

When the Hunter brothers broke the aviation endurance record, Western youths became ambitious to "stay aloft" as long as possible. Lacking airplanes the example of Alvin (Shipwreck) Kelly, pole-sitter, occurred to them. There was nothing to do but sit still. Hundreds of boys and even girls immediately got into the game and many of them are at it today.

In some sections the pole and tree sitters have been driven from the parks and recreation grounds; but, aided and abetted by proud parents, they may do as they like on private premises. These youthful aspirants are dividing attention with the bike riders. The latter craze has broken out persistently in New Jersey cities and towns. Newark, Hackensack, New Brunswick and Jersey City have teams grinding away in non-stop contests that threaten to put to shame what only a few years ago was referred to as the "cruel" six-day professional bicycle races. These boys are everlastingly sticking to rickety second-hand wheels for from six to ten and eleven hours a day each until relieved by a partner. Some of them sleep a few hours out of every twenty-four in garages or sheds.

The tree-sitters may not know it, but they are up against a record that eclipses that of Shipwreck Kelly. Mr. Kelly regards twenty-eight days as a wonderful performance, but St. Simon Stylites lived for more than thirty years atop a pillar—something of a mark to shoot at!

There is, apparently, no limit to the number of kinds of freak champions. Michael S. Petillo of Nutley, N. J., won a radio-listening contest this year on March 6. He listened continuously to a radio for 155 hours without sleep, subsisting on eggs and black coffee and sustained by the knowledge that the prize money would enable him to marry the girl of his choice.

Charles Drovo of Leroy, N. Y., held the world's raw egg-eating championship with forty raw eggs consumed in five minutes, until Max Hinel of Boston ate seventy-five raw eggs in ten minutes.

Bud Reynolds of Columbus, Ohio, played the piano continuously for 105 hours. He fainted once during the performance, but was revived and resumed playing in eight minutes. His bandaged fingertips were raw and his wrists and forearms swollen.

Antoine Lenuzze, a Frenchman, played the violin continuously for thirty hours. He is said to have played more than 600 pieces, ending with the Italian Royal March and the Marseillaise.

After establishing a beer-drinking record by downing seventeen glasses of the brew, amounting to ten and a half quarts, Donald Stephens of Colon, C. Z., collapsed. A few hours later he was able to sit up and challenge anybody to better his performance.

Cadarino Nazareno of Chicago claimed the catch-as-catch-can spaghetti-eating record after making away with seven feet of spaghetti per minute for 180 consecutive minutes, or 1,260 feet in three hours.

In Detroit, Mich, a marathon dance had lasted 106 days when the local authorities stopped it with five couples still on the floor. The dancers rested twenty minutes in every hour.

Other Strenuous Tests.

Harry Kantor of Bloomfield, N. J., burned out a bearing after eating eighty red peppers and had to quit, but he won a $50 prize and the "championship."

Alverado Fernando established a marathon dance record in Berlin in 1927 by remaining in motion 143 hours, except for ten minutes' rest every hour.

Former Representative Ernest Ackerman of Plainfield, N. J., has toted an umbrella for forty-five years as the result of a wager made with a friend in Liverpool.

Gus Comstock of Fergus Falls, Minn., gulped his way to the coffee-drinking championship by drinking eighty-five cupfuls in seven hours and fifteen minutes.

Eugene Leckey, 15, of Brooklyn, set a new kite flying record of forty-eight hours on Sept. 3, 1929.

Mrs. H. B. Schmidt of Champaign, Ill., claims the American record of 400 hours in a rocking chair. She "rocked" continuously, except for occasional "cat-naps."

Joseph de Virgilio of Boston walked on stilts from Boston to Providence, forty-five miles, in twelve hours and two minutes. The stilts were five feet long and weighed fifteen pounds.

Bill Williams of Hondo, Texas, pushed a peanut up Pike's Peak with his nose. It took him thirty days and he won a bet of $500.

TROPIC WINDS OF DEVASTATION AGAIN VISIT THE WEST PACIFIC

Another Typhoon Season Along Asiatic Coast Where Port Cities And Shipping Often Have Suffered in the Past

By C. F. TALMAN.

AGAIN the season of tropical hurricanes in the Northern Hemisphere is with us, and the first calamitous news it brings comes, not from the near-by Antillean region or our own Southern seaboard, but from the Far East, where on July 18 one of the most destructive typhoons of recent times swept over Southern Japan and Korea. The storm was cradled in the Torrid Zone, but, so far as reported, its devastating effects were experienced entirely in temperate latitudes.

Typhoons are tropical cyclones of the western North Pacific. In their characteristics and habits they are altogether similar to the tropical cyclones of the western North Atlantic, including the Caribbean Sea and the Gulf of Mexico. In both cases the term "tropical" applied to these disturbances refers to their origin, regardless of subsequent journeys outside the tropics, while "cyclones" implies merely a circulation of air around a centre of low barometric pressure, regardless of the strength of the winds.

Hurricanes Relatively Few.

In contrast to the usage of laymen—whether landlubbers or mariners—science finds it convenient to recognize the existence of gentle cyclones and gentle typhoons, while restricting the term "hurricane" to a violent tempest. Thus it appears from recent figures that in an average year nearly sixty typhoons visit the seas and shores of Eastern Asia and the outlying islands, but only one in six is a full-fledged hurricane at any stage of its career, while fully half of all typhoons are incapable of doing any harm. On the other hand, the milder disturbances often yield beneficial rains and are thus a real asset in human affairs.

Of course it is only the severe typhoons that occasionally break into the daily news and that invite comparison with West India hurricanes, with whose doings most Americans are more familiar. If we undertake such a comparison we shall discover, first of all, that the hurricanes of the typhoon area outnumber those of the western North Atlantic more than three to one. There are ten of the former to three of the latter in an average year.

Typhoon Destroys Army.

Measured in dollars, the damage wrought by some recent West India hurricanes, especially on the Florida coast and in Porto Rico, surpasses the worst effects of any typhoons on record, but in their toll of human lives typhoons have been far more disastrous. The recorded history of the Oriental storms is also much longer.

The most momentous of all typhoon disasters took place in the thirteenth century of the Christian era—more than 200 years before Christopher Columbus encountered the earliest West India hurricane of which a record is extant. In the Spring of 1280 the Japanese Emperor executed an Ambassador sent to him by the Mongol Emperor of China, Kublai Khan. To avenge this affront and to further his ambitious aims, Kublai dispatched an army of 100,000 men, who embarked in 3,500 ships to undertake the subjugation of Japan. On July 17, 1281, a typhoon annihilated this great armada, then anchored off Kiushiu Island, the same locality that suffered the effects of the recent severe storm, occurring at the same time of the year. Of the 100,000 men on board the ships it is stated that only three returned to China alive.

Another Historic Storm.

In modern times all the Far Eastern countries have paid heavy toll to these terrible scourges. One of the most disastrous typhoons to visit the China coast was that of July 27, 1862, when the whole waterfront of Canton was devastated so that hardly a building along the river escaped damage. The description in Ball's "Things Chinese" says:

"The place looked as if it had suffered from a bombardment, while thousands of the boat people were drowned before the eyes of the spectators on shore, who were powerless to render them any assistance. The loss of life in the city and neighborhood was estimated at 40,000. The wind blew with titanic force in great bursts, which shook the buildings; the air was darkened with leaves and bits of débris; the raging of the usually calm river, the cries of the drowning, the consciousness that any moment might be one's last, the passing of the centre of the storm when a lull occurred, giving one hopes that the worst was past, to be followed by a recurrence of all its force and danger; the flooded houses, streets like rivers—all combined to form a lurid picture, which, once seen, one never cares to see again. Such an indelible impression did this great typhoon make on the Chinese of that city that for many years they dated occurrences from the event."

Great loss of life attended the Haifong (Indo-China) typhoon of Oct. 5, 1881 (wrongly dated Oct. 8 in some descriptions), but the startling figures that have occasionally been published on this subject are open to question.

A typhoon, accompanied by a so-called tidal wave, passed over Swatow and the neighboring region on the night of Aug. 2-3, 1922, devastating a large part of the Han River delta. W. G. Kendrew writes of this event:

"A wall of water about twenty feet high was forced onto the shore of the harbor, carrying everything before it. Near Amoy a steamer of 4,000 tons disappeared, leaving hardly a trace behind. Another steamer was lifted bodily onto an island at the entrance to Amoy harbor. All along the coast the sea carried a ghastly freight of dead bodies, for many of the people spend their lives in boats on the adjacent waters."

Kendrew estimates the number drowned in this storm at 80,000; S. S. Visher quotes an estimate of 60,000 and another of 30,000. There is usually a large element of uncertainty in the data available concerning loss of life in disasters of this kind, whether in the Far East or elsewhere, but we cannot doubt that typhoons have in several instances claimed many more human victims than has any storm of the West India region. According to Dr. T. A. Jaggar, who investigated the great Japanese disaster of Sept. 1, 1923—which was a combination of earthquake, fire and typhoon—the storm winds, through their action in spreading the flames, were responsible for two-thirds of the 300,000 deaths in that colossal horror.

Three Ships Wrecked.

Typhoons play a big part in the nautical annals of Far Eastern waters, and several are remembered today chiefly as having caused the loss of individual ships, whose names have been given to the storms in question. Thus, three marine disasters are commemorated in the names of the Cantabria, De Witte and Iltis typhoons. The Cantabria and the De Witte were merchant ships; the Iltis was a German gunboat. The loss of the Iltis, with all but twelve of her crew, has inspired several dramatic descriptions. The vessel grounded off the Shantung promontory during the night of July 23-24, 1896, and was speedily broken up by the storm.

"At the moment of greatest danger," say H. Augustesen, "the commander called up the crew, and with death before them, they gave three cheers for his Majesty the Emperor. The stern broke away from the forepart, the boiler room giving way first. The masts fell overboard, dashed the bridge to pieces and destroyed the railings. Most of the crew and officers had remained on the quarterdeck, where Chief Gunner's Mate Raehm started the well-known song of 'The Flag Black-White-Red,' in which the others all joined. The song being over, the stern began to reel and finally went down, drawing everything that was on it into the deep. * * *" Here is a tale of splendid courage to brighten the gloomy history of typhoon tragedies.

Organized science has done much during the past half-century to mitigate the terrible scourge of typhoons. None of these tempests now approaches the Asiatic seaboard unheralded, thanks to the admirable system of storm warnings maintained under the direction of the great observatories at Manila, Zikawei (near Shanghai), Tokyo, Hongkong, Tsingtao and Phulien.

The warnings are based upon weather reports, centralized and distributed by wire and by radio broadcast, from scores of stations scattered all over Eastern Asia, from Siberia to Indo-China, and including island outposts as far east as Guam and Yap. Reports also are received from many ships at sea. Elaborate signals displayed at seaports show, by means of various symbols, the location and movements at last report of any typhoon within the range of observation, but frequent radio bulletins spread the same news much more effectively by land and sea.

The system of typhoon warnings that now prevails in the Far East dates from July, 1879, when the first of such announcements was issued at Manila by the pioneer student of these storms, Father Faura.

Manila Is Signal Point.

Manila is strategically situated for getting the earliest information of typhoons, as it takes two or three days, and sometimes more, for the centre of one to cross the China Sea to the coast of Asia. If the storm track curves around to the northeast from three to ten days or more elapse before the storm centre reaches Japan. Hence, the warnings from Manila are of the utmost value to the whole of the Asiatic and Japanese coast lines from Singapore up to Yokohama.

Hongkong frequently has been saved from disaster by these warnings. When the Americans cut the cable between Manila and Hongkong during the war with Spain the commander of the British fleet at the latter place dispatched a message to Admiral Dewey urging that he restore service as soon as possible if he did not wish to make himself responsible for the loss of life and property that doubtless would result from the lack of telegraphic advices of typhoons from the Manila Observatory.

RESERVE OFFICERS NOW HAVE THEIR TRAINING IN CAMPS

Manhattan Chapter of Their Association Has Many Members Who Are Prominent in Civic Life

DURING July and early August the various army posts and military camps in the general vicinity of New York receive their annual influx of reserve officers. On or about July 1 some 700 such officers departed for a dozen different camps, usually to spend two weeks on active service under field conditions. The United States Government pays transportation to and from the camp and also allows compensation for the time spent. The officers work hard, but return tanned and refreshed, with a new stock of knowledge and pungent narratives.

Because of limitations imposed by Congressional appropriations, only a small fraction of the total number of New York reserve officers may enjoy this period of active duty. One-tenth of the total of 100,000 or more reserve officers in the United States are located in this State, the majority of them in Manhattan and Brooklyn. They rank from Second Lieutenant to Brigadier General and represent every arm and service in the military organization.

Manhattan Chapter Large.

A large proportion of these reserve officers are members of the Reserve Officers' Association, which has branches in practically every State and local chapters in some 600 cities and towns. The Manhattan Chapter is the largest of all these local organizations. It has more than 600 paid members. Brooklyn has a very active, though smaller, chapter, and there are also chapters in near-by New Jersey cities.

The roster of the Manhattan Chapter contains many prominent names. Every stratum of society, every creed and race, is represented. Among the Brigadier Generals are Secretary of State Henry L. Stimson, Lincoln C. Andrews, Howard S. Borden, Brice P. Disque, William Barclay Parsons, John J. Phelan, Palmer E. Pierce, Cornelius Vanderbilt, Charles E. Warren and John Ross Delafield, a former national president of the association.

Among the sixty Colonels on the chapter's rolls are Lieut. Gov. Herbert H. Lehman, Richard C. Patterson, Commissioner of Correction, and Franklin Q. Brown, president of the Army and Navy Club. Other familiar names among the Colonels are Julius O. Adler, Fred H. Albee, Herbert Barry, George W. Burleigh, William J. Burns, William M. Chadbourne, Henry D. Lindsley, Thatcher T. P. Luquer, Herman M. Metz, Gustave Porges, E. Parmalee Prentice, W. A. Starrett, F. E. Stoddard and Henry R. Winthrop. The medical profession is represented by Colonels Harlow Brooks, Emanuel Giddings, Samuel Kopetsky, Alexander Lambert and John B. Walker; the dentists by Colonel W. A. Heckard, and chemistry by Colonel F. G. Zinsser.

From the official life of New York, past and present, the association draws a number of other well-known figures, such as Major William F. Deegan, Lieut. Col. Dominick Henry, Major Philip Rhinelander and Captain Louis Cuvillier. A surprising number of members are connected with the literary life of the city, including Major Irvin Cobb, Major Merle Crowell, Captain Peter B. Kyne, Captain A. E. Rinehart and Major Herbert Bayard Swope. The theatre contributes Major Edward Bowes, Captain J. H. Carroll and Major John Golden. Among other officers of prominence in the city's civic life are Major Peter J. Brady, Major Maurice Campbell, Lieut. Col. Fred Cardway, Lieut. Col. Grayson M.-P. Murphy, Captain William J. Pedrick and Captain B. A. Tintner, chaplain of the Jewish Theatrical Guild.

The membership is by no means confined to Colonels and field officers, but contains a large number of Lieutenants and other junior officers. Among them are a few non-commissioned officers of the regular army, who hold commissions in the reserves; numerous recent graduates of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps courses at local universities, and many veterans of the World War.

Officers' Activities.

Under the presidency of Major William A. Hardenbergh the Manhattan chapter holds regular monthly luncheon meetings at the Army and Navy Club from September to June, at which military subjects are presented by speakers of national reputation. The War Department allows credit for attendance on the military records of those participating.

The Reserve Officers' Association was organized two years after enactment of the national defense act of 1920. At present about one-fifth of all reserve officers are members. The association maintains headquarters in Washington. Colonel Walter C. Cole of Detroit is national president. The office of the secretary of the Manhattan chapter, Major James A. Tobey, is in the Borden Building at 350 Madison Avenue. The secretary of the Brooklyn chapter is Lieutenant H. M. Dederer of 1,934 Greene Avenue, Brooklyn.

Secretary of War Patrick J. Hurley has stated that only by the efforts of reserve officers in following up training among their own personnel and by aiding in the training of our civilians can we maintain adequate defense within reasonable cost limits.

Since 1922 a gradual increase in Congressional appropriations has been secured, so that in 1930 nearly $7,000,000 was allotted to provide for the training of about 20,000 reserve officers.

PASSING OF THE OLD FEDERAL BUILDING

Its Removal Will Open Again the Vista That Looks Toward the City Hall Park

TWO years hence, the city's distinguished guests, proceeding from the Battery up Broadway, will glimpse through the whirling paper shower of New York's welcome a more cheerful sight than the gloomy, granite pile that now blocks their view. Instead, the narrow canyon will widen into a large, open park; the City Hall will be plainly visible, and the new white structures of the Civic Centre and the gleaming spire of the Chrysler Building in the distance will form an imposing background.

The popular agitation and official negotiations which have gone on intermittently for thirty years have finally culminated in a definite agreement between the City and Federal governments. Two new buildings are to house all the government bureaus now occupying the old Federal Building, which will then be torn down so that City Hall Park may resume as nearly as possible its appearance of a century ago.

Systematic Plans in View.

The haphazard circumstances which permitted City Hall to be surrounded by an anomalous brownstone court house and a granite Hall of Records in the French style have been superseded by systematic municipal planning. Future developments contemplate the erection around City Hall of a stately and harmonious group of buildings in the Civic Centre. One of these is to be the new Federal Court House.

Needless to say, there will be no gallows at the foot of the park, where Jacob Leisler was hanged within sight of his home and where the morbidly curious used to gather to watch public executions. But had any one wished to put up so gruesome a monument, it would have been simple until a few years ago. Only a decade or two has passed since the gallows, which according to tradition formerly occupied this spot, fell to pieces and was cleared out of the attic in the Federal Building.

It seems strange that a spot as beautiful and as historic as City Hall Park in the nineteenth century should have been surrendered for a building site. Yet, there was scarcely a dissenting voice when the proposal was made. Central Park had just been opened and was considered more than ample for the city's recreation needs. Business, expanding and moving uptown, found the old postoffice on Nassau Street between Cedar and Liberty inaccessible and inadequate.

Opened With a Parade.

The site at City Hall Park was considered appropriate for a public edifice, and the completion of the Federal Building was hailed with delight. In August, 1875, it was ready for occupancy. Preceded by a fife and drum corps, the postoffice clerks, each bearing an inkpot or a high stool, marched out of the Nassau Street building and up Broadway to their new offices. After describing this historic procession and the interior of the building, which contained furniture "essentially of the elegant rather than the gaudy type," THE NEW YORK TIMES of that day went on to say that "every credit is due to the great ability shown by United States Supervising Architect William A. Potter in perfecting the plans of the building and giving to New York an edifice that will be a continual source of pride to it."

As the City Changed.

In a day when it dwarfed every other building in the neighborhood except St. Paul's, the Federal Building may have been an imposing terminus to lower Broadway; but when practically all the offices around it began to tower above it, it lost its impressiveness and more open space was felt necessary as a relief in the congested downtown area. And while the Romanesque arches and heavy pillars may have been an appropriate background for women with bustles and for men with Dundrearies, they are too pompous for the slim stenographers that today hurry past the building on the way to lunch. So popular feeling changed and by 1900 the papers were calling the "continual source of pride" an eyesore and were urging its removal.

But governments are slower to move than public opinion. Consequently it was not until 1912 that the first bill was introduced in Congress providing for the acquisition of a new postoffice site. That legislation was shelved, and the war temporarily called a halt to further efforts to obtain a new building. However, negotiations were resumed in 1919; but the various sites suggested by the city were not acceptable to Federal authorities until in 1923 they approved of the blocks that have now been definitely chosen for the two buildings. Agreement about the price could not be reached, however, until, after five years of discussion between the two governments, the Merchants' Association, with the backing of many other organizations in the city, came forward with the compromise plan that is the basis of the settlement recently reached.

Under the terms of the present agreement the Secretary of the Treasury is to purchase from the city for $2,450,000 the site in the Civic Centre for the court house. At the same time he will initiate proceedings to obtain the Church Street block for a postoffice site. Almost nine-tenths of the purchase price of this land will then be refunded to the Treasury Department by the city, and in exchange the park space will be returned. This refund is based on the ratio of the area of the Federal Building site to that of the new postoffice, and, according to recent appraisals, will amount to about $1,500,000, three times as much as the government paid for the land in the park fifty-five years ago. The city will also pay the cost of tearing down the old building, which will probably be about $250,000. And, naturally, the city will bear the entire cost of restoring the park.

Congress already has approved these arrangements, and favorable action by the Board of Estimate is anticipated within a short time. The actual construction work should be under way by Fall, and the fulfillment of the plans for an expanded and more picturesque Civic Centre now seems virtually a certainty.

TELEPHONE TIME-GIVING EXTENDS TO WIDER AREA

Fifty Thousand Daily Calls in the Metropolitan District Help Keep Work and Play Moving on Time

AFTER Aug. 1 all who live within the area served by the New York Telephone Company will find the correct time of day at their disposal at no more cost than it takes to call up the local grocer.

For two years metropolitan dwellers have been able to learn the time merely by taking down the telephone receiver and asking for Meridian 1212. But those who dwell outside the city limits, unless they wished to pay toll rates, have had to depend still upon the town clock, if they could see it, or the factory whistle, if they could hear it, to set their watches by.

They have not been satisfied. In the first place they have lost faith in the scientific accuracy of factory whistles and town clocks. The radio, with its periodical gong-striking and announcement of the exact hour to the second, has introduced a new concept of time-keeping even to those remote regions where train schedules are not a vital, twice-a-day matter and where precise punctuality has counted for little. But the radio does not fill the newly felt need entirely, for it gives the hour when it chooses, not whenever the listener-in requires.

"Central" as a Time Giver.

All of these people, wherever they are, once looked to the telephone operator as the source of exact time information when they had to have it. Then suddenly the erstwhile obliging "central" started refusing their requests, and they learned that the telephone company had stopped giving out the time. Now the company has decided to restore that old informal question-and-answer relationship by supplying time information to all patrons for a fixed charge of 5 cents from flat-rate subscribers and from coin box and public telephone users, and for the equivalent of one local call charge from message rate subscribers.

In 1928, when the New York Telephone Company started to resume time service maintained on a business basis, it went in for time-keeping and time-giving along more scientific lines. In each of the five boroughs of the city is a centralized bureau with special switchboard positions to which are routed all calls for Meridian 1212. Each time-bureau operator has her own little electrical clock from which she gives the correct time to the nearest half-minute. For the extension of this service to the State a number of similar bureaus will be established at points conveniently placed to serve each general locality.

Some idea of the popularity of time service can be gained from the fact that in the first two weeks after Meridian 1212 was created it was called, on an average, some 10,000 times a day. In seven months it was being called approximately 41,000 times a day, and by Jan. 1, 1930, some 52,000 times a day.

Daylight Saving Changes.

Twice a year all New York appears particularly time-minded: when Eastern Standard Time changes to Daylight Saving, and when Daylight Saving turns back to Eastern Standard. On the Sunday last year when Standard Time was resumed the number of time calls jumped more than 100 per cent over the normal Sunday traffic. Some 68,000 persons on that September day corrected their clocks.

New Yorkers appear little concerned with the time of day except as their work is concerned. Saturday and Sunday are dull days at the time bureaus, but by Sunday night a sudden spurt of interest comes. There are clocks that have stopped over the week-end and general uncertainty as to whether those still going have lost or gained. Between 10 and 11 P. M. people begin to think about the alarm for Monday morning, and so a peak is created in calls for the time.

Residential subscribers are the largest users of the time service. Outside of Manhattan the busy hour comes from 7 to 8 A. M., when business folk grow anxious over getting to the office on time and mothers are concerned with getting small charges off to school.

In Manhattan the daily busy period at the bureau lasts from 7 until 9 A. M. and is thought to be created equally by offices setting their clocks for the day and by apartment dwellers. Business on the Meridian line picks up again between 11 and 12 o'clock, supposedly in deference to luncheon appointments, and between 4 and 5 o'clock, as commuters begin to think of home-bound trains.

TRUNK LINES DEEMED A TRANSPORT STIMULUS

Next of Projected Additional Routes Would Cut Through Mid-Continent—To Carry Passengers

By LAUREN D. LYMAN.

THE air mail industry—for it has reached the point where it may be called that—is slowly taking shape under the new air mail law, familiarly known as the Watres act, and one of the developments that appears to be something for the immediate future is a second transcontinental air mail line which will also carry passengers. The Postmaster General has intimated that he favors a third transcontinental line also.

The ground work is well laid for such a system, with north and south airways, which ultimately will give this country a literal network of air mail lines. Then can come the realization of the aeronautical industry's dream—first-class mail by air all over the country.

A glance at the present air mail map reveals how well the work has been started. We have the Boeing line from San Francisco to Chicago by way of Salt Lake, Cheyenne and Omaha, now carrying passengers, express and mail on a twenty-hour schedule. We have the Chicago-New York mail line operated by N. A. T., which, like Boeing, is under the aegis of United Aircraft and Transport.

Other Eastern Connections.

This system connects at Cleveland with the Colonial east-and-west system through Buffalo, Rochester and the Mohawk Valley to Albany, where it meets the New York-Montreal air mail and passenger line, another Colonial division.

Boston is looped in under Colonial by a line from Boston to Hartford and New York, which is a successful and established passenger and express as well as mail line.

Into this picture has come the New England and Western Transportation, a new system backed by Springfield (Mass.) capital, equipped with Ford trimotors and operating twice daily from New York to Albany and Boston, with Springfield as the junction point. Three round-trips a day are made between New York and Boston with changes at Springfield. This company is definitely in the field for air mail, although no contract appears available at this time.

Of immediate importance, however, is the mid-continent-transcontinental, on which representatives of the Post-office Department, Western Air Express and Transcontinental Air Transport-Maddux Air Lines have been working for the past month.

No one knows just what route this projected system will follow, but predictions more or less unite on a line from Los Angeles by way of Albuquerque to Kansas City, St. Louis, Columbus, Pittsburgh and Newark, the present Eastern terminal of all air mail lines serving New York.

Both Systems Are Active.

Both Western Air Express and T. A. T.-Maddux are now operating over this system, Western Air coming through to Kansas City and the air-rail line operating from Columbus to Los Angeles save for a 300-mile night jump between Waynoka, Okla., and Clovis, N. M. Western Air is a pioneer air mail carrier and has handled many of the largest mail loads in the history of the air mail on its line between Los Angeles and Salt Lake City. At the same time, the company has expanded its passenger services to cover the Pacific Coast and Southwest. Its Standard Air Lines follow the Southern tier of States to Dallas.

Its Kansas City line is the longest single daylight hop in passenger service in this country, and that means anywhere in the world. Its mid-continent subsidiary serves Denver, the central region and Texas, cutting east and west lines at Albuquerque, Cheyenne and San Antonio.

T. A. T. has never been a mail carrier but, except for the Pennsylvania rail unit between New York and Columbus, the system is strategically placed to carry the mail east of Kansas City. An extension from Columbus to Pittsburgh would be simple, and now Pittsburgh Airways, backed by Pittsburgh capital and operating between Newark and Pittsburgh with passengers only, is in the field for a contract over this segment of a new transcontinental.

Under the law the Postmaster General may extend the present contract of an existing airline to take in more territory under existing rates. After a period the extension may be further extended. At the same time, the contractor, after obtaining permission from the government, can assign a section of his system to another operator if it is seen that such a move is in the interests of better service and the promotion of air transport generally. In these provisions observers see a way whereby Western Air might extend its line across the country and T. A. T. and Pittsburgh Airways or some other system might benefit through assignment of a part of the territory.

Strong Group to South.

Going further south, another big group comes into the picture; Aviation Corporation of Delaware, parent company to Colonial, Universal, Robertson Airways, Southern Air Transport and others, reaching from New England through the Middle West south to the Mexican border and the Gulf and connecting with Western Air's subsidiary from the coast at Dallas and extending northeast to Atlanta, the southern junction point of Eastern Air Transport's mail line from Newark to Miami.

Why three transcontinental air-mail lines? The answer is obvious—to carry more air mail. Moreover, to stimulate further the transport of passengers and express by air and to knit the far-flung empire that is the United States into a still more homogeneous nation. Communications and lines of communication and contact are the arteries of a community. Few who have not traveled by air can realize how the speed of air transport will contribute and is contributing today to the work of joining the viewpoints and aims of the separate centres in the United States. In the formative days of the American Republic, European statesmen, reckoning without the railroad and airplane, predicted freely that such a nation could never exist because of the distances. Provincial and sectional aims and needs, they said, made it impossible. The war between the States was a triumph for these prophets and much that they said is only now ceasing to be true because of the airplane.

Ever since the World War the several departments of the Federal Government have been working together on the same problem, especially through aviation. The Watres bill was written with the same viewpoint. Preference under the law in granting contracts is to be given to operators whose air lines are for passengers and express. Mail is to be carried as a stimulant, a small backlog for the transport by air of persons and goods.

BRIGHTEST AERIAL BEACON WILL SHINE AT AIR RACES

THE most brilliant aerial beacon in the world, a rotating light shaft of 2,000,000,000 candle-power which will be visible 500 miles away, is rapidly nearing completion atop the thirty-nine-story Palmolive Building in Chicago. Below the main beacon is a fixed light ray of 300,000,000 candle-power pointing toward the Municipal Airport.

To be known as the Lindbergh Beacon, the brightest aerial lighthouse yet to be devised was designed by the late Elmer A. Sperry and presented by him to the city of Chicago shortly before his death.

Dedication plans are being worked out in conjunction with the national air races to be held on the model Curtiss-Wright-Reynolds airport from Aug. 23 to Sept. 1, inclusive.

FIGHT FIRE FROM AIR

Pilots of Ontario Provincial Service Put in Long Hours On Patrol and Transport Crews

By JAMES MONTAGNES.

EARLY in June, when the fire hazard in Northern Ontario was at its peak and the planes of the Ontario Provincial Air Service were putting in hour after hour in the suppression of fires, there was one pilot who established a new record for the service, and perhaps for commercial operation. Leaving his base before the sun had risen, he continued to transport men and supplies back and forth from base to fire for sixteen hours, with only enough rest in between to allow more men and more supplies to be loaded and his tanks refilled.

That was one record that the Ontario Provincial Air Service has hung up already this year. The service last year, in six months' time, flew 11,602 hours with twenty-six machines. That was its sixth year of operating. This year even its best record will be bettered, judging from the work already done by the pilots and machines.

The service is maintained by the provincial government for the protection of the vast forest wealth in the northern part of Ontario, especially that section which lies above the railway right of way. It is part of the Ontario Department of Lands and Forests. It is a non-commercial service operated on highly efficient commercial lines, its cost charged to the various government departments which make use of it. It has the distinction of being the largest aerial fire-fighting force in the world, with practically all its work confined to the protection of the bush in a country which is traversed only by canoe and outboard-motor-driven canoe in Summer time.

Nothing shows the intense work of the service during its operations in the bush more clearly than the recital of the hours run up by certain pilots and certain machines. Here are the figures for pilots from May 1 to Oct. 15, 1929: Swartman, who went to Eielson's rescue last Spring, flew 889 hours last Summer. Next to him came Pilot Ken Murray with 704 hours, including one day of 15 hours and 5 minutes. Then followed others with the figures 671, 624, 577, 573, 565, 559 and 554 hours.

These are all hours for flights made with DeHavilland Moth detection planes or H. S. 2L flying boats for transporting men and supplies. Four of the last-named craft put in 662, 643, 626 and 533 hours respectively last Summer. The record for a week's flying is held by W. H. Lyons, who put in 60 hours and 20 minutes in one week.

The method of operation is as follows: Planes go on patrols daily, weather permitting. When a fire is sighted the nearest base is at once notified. By means of a chain of more than twenty short wave radio stations in the region, headquarters gets the word and all instructions are issued for the release of planes and supplies to fly men and fire-fighting equipment to the scene of the fire. Planes run back and forth with their heavy loads till enough men are on hand to cope with the fire. When the fire is out the planes call for the men and the equipment again.

Sometimes, however, pilots are lost in the course of their daily patrols, as the smoke from fires is dense and rises high. One pilot and an engineer on patrol were lost in this way last May when the fires were pretty heavy. He knew about where he was, and his base knew where he had gone. But he was forced down on an unmapped lake when a bad storm came up. The storm covered a large area, making rescue operations from the base impossible. For three days the storm lasted. On the fourth day the rescue party set out. They located the plane without much difficulty right on its route. They found the two men happy and bearded in a birch bark shelter rigged up on shore and partaking of big speckled trout and hardtack. The stranded aviators were back at their base that afternoon, and set out the next day to retrieve their plane, which needed slight repairs after riding the storm on the lake.

FLYING BOATS NOW STOP POACHING IN NORTH SEA

ROYAL AIR FORCE flying boats from Felixstowe Marine Aircraft Establishment, during the last few months, have been patrolling British waters in the North Sea. So effective has been their work, according to The London Telegraph, that they have almost put a complete stop to the poaching by Belgian and French fishing boats within the three-mile limit. This work has been carried on in conjunction with the Fisheries Protection Flotilla.

The vessels of the Protection Flotilla have been fitted with wireless apparatus suitable for communication with aircraft. This cooperation has resulted in the capture of a number of poaching vessels and subsequent prosecution, the areas patrolled being chiefly sole fisheries. It is proposed now to extend these patrols to the herring fisheries.

"CONTACT"

By REGINALD M. CLEVELAND

IN the death of Glenn H. Curtiss aviation has suffered the loss not only of one of its outstanding pioneers, but of an inventor of unusual versatility and genius whose willingness to translate unshakable enthusiasm for new speeds on land and in air into personal demonstrations of the machines he conceived and built played a great part in kindling national enthusiasm both for flying craft and for the motors suitable to drive them.

Holder of Air Pilot's License No. 1 in America, Curtiss made the first public flight, the flights which took the early Scientific American trophies, the Bishop Prize and the Gordon Bennett Cup and won the $10,000 New York World prize for his historic flight down the Hudson from Albany. He added to his laurels by contributing many solid and constructive ideas to both airplane and motor design. His work on light motors was particularly notable, and more fliers took to wings sustained by the Ox engine, which was his brain child, than by any other motor yet designed. He gave to aviation both the pontoon and the flying boat, the hinged aileron and the fixed stabilizer. A visionary, in the best sense, the stuff of which his dreams were wrought will endure.

AVIATION has a good deal to ponder over in this month's decision of Justice George P. Hahn of the District Court of Ohio in what has come to be called the "Cleveland airport case." This decision sets up the arbitrary limit of 500 feet—the limit of safe flight over uncongested areas as fixed by the Department of Commerce—as a minimum below which airplanes from an airport may not fly over private abutting property without committing a trespass. It specifically enjoins the defendants in the case, Curtiss Airports Corporation and other subsidiaries of the Curtiss-Wright Corporation, from operating planes at a lower height than 500 feet over the property of the plaintiffs, two brothers, F. L. and R. H. Swetland, whose country estate, which the testimony valued at $115,000, adjoins the airport. It further enjoins them from permitting dust caused by their operations to drift over this property and from permitting the dropping of circulars from airplanes over or in proximity to it. It refuses to sustain the plaintiff's contention that a private airport or flying school is a nuisance per se.

THERE will naturally be no complaint from those interested in aviation or in airports over this last refusal. If they are wise, in view of the very apparent temper of many communities in relation to dust, flying operations late at night, noise and other inconveniences which an active airport may bring to its neighbors, they will not seek to combat the lesser injunctions as to dust and circulars which the justice orders. When it comes to the fixing of a definite height in feet, however, above which it is deemed proper for planes to operate over abutting property but below which it is a trespass for them to operate, experts agree that the judge has taken a dangerous if not an untenable position. They point out that if 500 feet is to be a minimum height at which an airplane taking off from an airport may cross the line of an adjoining property holder, then airports must in all cases be large enough to permit such altitude to be gained before the limits of the field are reached.

They maintain further that there is nothing to prevent an adjoining property holder from erecting a building 600 or 800 or 1,000 feet high near the edge of the airport which would invade the zone in which the decision allows them to fly. Who would then be the trespasser, they ask, and not without reason. If the limit where proper flight becomes trespass is 499 feet in Ohio, what is it to be in California or Maine or New Jersey? Finally, who is to determine that the flier was at 500 feet when he crossed the line between airport and adjoining property?

Those with an important stake in airports in the United States do not wish to arouse public antagonism. Quite the contrary. But they hold that trespass by airplane is a knotty problem and that it should be based on a reasonable enjoyment of his property rights by the neighbor of an airport and not upon some fixed level of ceiling which must always be affected by individual circumstances. The Ohio decision will be appealed.

THE Aeronautics Branch of the Department of Commerce has been active in dealing with violations of regulations during the second quarter of the year. Gilbert G. Budwig, in charge of regulations, announced last week that 177 such violations had been dealt with. An increase of 55 offenses over the first three months of the year was shown. Of the offenses 32 were violations of the acrobatic provisions and 31 of the low-flying clauses in the regulations. Punishments included the suspensions of 63 licenses, the revocation of 12 and the refusal of 5. Proper activity in enforcement will do much for the advancement of safe flight.

JAMES H. (JIMMIE) DOOLITTLE returned last week from a very unusual trip to Europe. He headed an expedition to demonstrate American planes and American flying to those of other lands, which had with it four types of Curtiss planes—a Hawk, a Falcon, a Robin and a Fledgling. The expedition visited the capital of Greece, the Balkan States, Rumania, Bulgaria, Lithuania, Poland, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Belgium and Holland, closing its exhibitions at Rotterdam. At each demonstration Doolittle and his fellow-pilots put the American machines through stunt flying which amazed the observers, not only at the skill of the flying, but at the stanchness of the craft which could endure such strains. Among his passengers he carried Prince Cyril of Bulgaria, the Prime Minister of Turkey and the President of Austria. He did much to "sell" American aviation abroad.

NEXT Wednesday F. Trubee Davison, Assistant Secretary of War for Aeronautics, will take off on an inspection tour of Air Corps activities which will carry him 10,000 miles by air from the Canadian to the Mexican borders and from coast to coast. He will travel in the latest of the army's fast transport planes, a Fleetster, whose Hornet motor gives it a cruising speed of 145 miles an hour. So extensive a journey may well presage the liberation of other secretaries of other departments from the traditional desk to the wings which will let them see the work of their departments over the nation at first hand.

PLANE RIDE IS CALLED ANTIDOTE FOR HAY FEVER

AS yet another of its manifold spheres of usefulness, the airplane is now depicted as a means to avoid hay fever. Miss Edith Agnew of 59 East Fifty-sixth Street writes to THE NEW YORK TIMES that she has found relief from this affliction in flight.

"I cannot refrain," she says, "from writing you in the interest of all my fellow-sufferers from that unhappy scourge, hay fever. Very much dreading the effects of a three-hour journey at this season of the year by railroad, I conceived the idea of rising above the pollen area, and so flew in a three-motored Ford airplane of the New York Airways in 50 minutes from Atlantic City to the Newark Airport.

"Although I have no reason to doubt it, I am only cognizant of the fact that there are no 'coughs in a carload' by advertisement. I am convinced beyond a peradventure that there isn't a sneeze in a trip by airplane from Atlantic City to Newark. If my experience can induce a few poor sneezers to thus gain some respite from a real nuisance, I shall be very happy."

AIR LOCKS BRING PERIL

Cause Puzzling Stoppages in Fuel Flow Which Stall Motors Near Time of Take-Off

ANALYSES of investigations into fatal crashes and forced landings due to motor failure during the initial climb of planes lay the blame for such failures at the door of fuel line arrangements, according to a survey by Professor Alexander Klemin of the Guggenheim School and Major G. L. Lloyd, vice president of Barber & Baldwin, Inc., aviation insurance underwriters.

When planes are stopped by shutting off the fuel at the base of the storage tanks the lines become empty, Major Lloyd said. The first turn of the valve preparatory to starting again fills the bowl of the carburetor by sending a slow trickle down the side of the line, which does not force all the air out of the line. It forms a seal on the lower end, precluding the escape of the remaining air. There is sufficient fuel for starting and warming the motor.

As soon as the plane is wheeled to the runway and taken off at full throttle, however, the fuel present in the carburetors is used up before the necessity for full throttle operation is passed. The air-bound fuel lines refuse to feed gasoline fast enough to keep the mixture to capacity, and the manifolds fill with more air through the carburetor air intakes.

Motors which stall from this cause are hard to start again, as the air-binding soon extends through the valve chambers, manifolds and cylinder heads, so that even though the pilot realizes his position with the first sign of faltering he becomes helpless to remedy the situation. The limit of his resourcefulness is usually taxed in the imperative endeavor to land the plane safely, and he has little time to bother with the engine.

The investigators said in a report submitted to the industry and to the Department of Commerce:

"We are satisfied that this condition can and does exist, and probably accounts for many unexplained accidents with competent pilots at the controls. In one of our tests it took more than five minutes before a full flow of gasoline was achieved following an air lock in the lines—the air bubbling out through the carburetor instead of exhausting itself through the vents in the tank. In another test the air in the line restricted the flow 50 per cent for a period of four minutes. In some tests no air locks occurred; in others the flow was full for several minutes, when it would become intermittent as sections of air were forced through the lines. When all the air was exhausted the flow again became normal."

SMALL TANDEM PLANE FLIES FAST, LANDS SLOW

A FLYING speed of more than 115 miles an hour and a landing speed of thirty miles an hour were made in tests last week of a tandem-wing monoplane powered with a seventy-one-horsepower motor at the Westfield (N. J.) airport. Among those who witnessed the tests was President Menasco of the Menasco Motor Company of California, manufacturer of the Pirate ninety-horsepower inverted, air-cooled motor, which may be used as the monoplane power plant.

The craft was piloted by George Fernic, the designer. Peter Dronin, co-designer and formerly with Igor Sikorsky, accompanied the pilot as a passenger. The main wing of the plane is thirty-five feet long, while the front wing is half that length.

RESERVE PILOTS ACTIVE AT THE LOCAL AIR FIELDS

Nineteen Places Available in Marine and Naval Units for Air-Minded Youth—Army Method Changed

NINETEEN places in the three primary training classes in the aviation units of the Naval and Marine reserves are still open, according to a recent announcement. Seven of the places are in the Marine Division and twelve in the Naval Air Reserve. College graduates under 26 years of age and qualified to pass the necessary physical examinations for enlistment and flight are eligible, and the commanding officers are sending out requests for applicants. The course consists of elimination flight training at Valley Stream, L. I.

The survivors of the elimination flight classes will take further training at Pensacola for both services. On the successful completion of advanced training the students will be commissioned and placed on the regular reserve officers' lists.

Initial training will be given by Lieutenant W. P. Youngs, who is in charge of the Marine classes, and under Lieutenant Richard Whitehead, who is in command of the local unit of the naval station at Valley Stream. Applicants have been instructed to forward the requests for entrance to those two officers, addressed to the Naval Reserve Air Station at the airport in Valley Stream.

Those who successfully complete the courses will be assigned a one-year period of active duty in the various aircraft squadrons attached to the Marine Corps and Naval Air Service.

They will be commissioned as Second Lieutenants in the Marine Corps or as ensigns in the Naval Air Service, according to the conditions of enlistment. The enlistments are for the period of training, and elimination allows the applicant the privilege of resigning. Applications will be received up to Aug. 15 for the first of the remaining classes and up to Sept. 15 for the last class.

Army Method Changed.

A new method of training Air Corps Reserve officers in the Second Corps Area was successfully tried at Mitchel Field when the first group of these officers was ordered to active duty July 6 to 19. Contrary to the practice of previous years, when the reserves were assigned individually to regular army squadrons on duty at the field, the reserve pilots operated as an independent squadron.

The officers ordered to the first active duty training period were members of the 369th Observation Squadron (Reserve), which was one of two squadrons organized in New York recently of Group I pilots in this corps area. This squadron has a complete quota of officer personnel and, while the unit was in training, each officer performed the particular duties of his assignment as operations officer, adjutant, engineering officer, &c. Several regular army officers were designated by Lieut. Col. Howard, commandant at Mitchel Field, to supervise and assist in carrying out a training program which had been prepared in advance to give the reserve officers as much information as possible of the Air Corps duties both on the ground and in flying.

The ground training covered such essential subjects of the Air Service as meteorology, photography, airplane engineering, radio communication, navigation, &c., and the flying activities included training in cross-country flights, air navigation and formation flying. Flights were made to Bridgeport, Conn., where the Sikorsky plant was inspected, and to Camp Dix (N. J.) and the Naval Air Station at Philadelphia. A demonstration of the latest developments in radio telephone communication apparatus was given to the officers at Mitchel Field by the Bell Telephone Laboratories, Inc., who sent their two completely radio equipped airplanes (a tri-motored Ford and a Fairchild) to the field and showed how a telephone conversation could be carried on between persons in different planes in the air or with persons on the ground.

Officers and Their Work.

Major John M. Hayward, commanding; Captain Thomas D. Behne, operations officer; Captain Daniel H. Pratt, adjutant; Lieutenant Charles S. Cline, liaison and intelligence officer; Lieutenant Donald K. Mumma, assistant operations officer; Lieutenant Lewis F. Seaman, personnel officer; Lieutenant George S. Stead, engineering officer; Second Lieutenant James G. Adams, meteorology officer; Second Lieutenant James D. Allen, assistant adjutant; Second Lieutenant John D. Crehore, photographic officer, and Second Lieutenant Paul L. Foster, communications officer.

A sample order of operations read:

"The officers of this squadron will each perform the following missions on this date:

"A reconnaissance flight in PT-1s from Mitchel Field, passing over the following places in the order named:

"Flushing, Holmes Airport, North Beach Airport, Hudson River Bridge, Teterboro Airport, Newark Airport, Miller Field, S. I.; Fort Washington, Fort Hamilton, Floyd Bennett Field, Valley Stream Airport, thence return to Mitchel Field.

"Upon completion of flight, each officer will report in person to the commanding officer of the squadron, Major Hayward, concerning points of interest observed, and be prepared, if requested, to submit a written report of such mission.

"Aircraft engaged in this mission will leave Mitchel Field at intervals of two minutes, beginning promptly at 7:45 A. M."

AIR MAIL STAMPS IN BAG BYRD FLEW TO FRANCE

PHILIP H. WARD JR., a well-known philatelist of Philadelphia contributes the following story regarding the Atlantic flight of Rear Admiral Byrd to the current issue of Mekeel's Weekly Stamp News:

"It seems that after Byrd had completed his flight across the Atlantic, carrying the first official United States mail, Postmaster General New and his assistant, Irving W. Glover, thought that the bag in which the mail was carried would be an excellent addition to the post-office exhibit in the National Museum. As a result, they requested the French Government to return the mail bag. On its arrival, Mr. Glover took it in to show it to the Postmaster General, at which time the bag was turned inside out.

"Imagine their surprise when there dropped from the bag a five-cent Roosevelt stamp, which had originally been applied to one of the air mail letters, and had become detached from the letter at the time the plane fell into the ocean off the coast of France."

HAVE YOU BEEN TO GASPE?

Spectacular Scenery, Thrilling Drives, Hospitable People of Peninsula Offer Motorists New Experience

By LEON A. DICKINSON.

PREVIOUS to 1925, the Gaspé Peninsula had no improved roads. On the south shore there was a colonization road that could be traversed in dry weather but was impassable when wet. The north shore was practically without roads because of its extremely rugged topography, while the interior plateau was, and still is, inaccessible to all wheeled vehicles.

In 1925, the Department of Roads of Quebec Province undertook the construction of a continuous highway around the entire peninsula, and the completion of that highway, now known as the Perron Boulevard, ended the isolation of this region by making it accessible to motor cars.

The greater part of this road lies close to the shore, the circuit being completed by an overland connection from Matapédia, at the head of Baie des Chaleurs, to Ste. Flavie, on the St. Lawrence River. The complete loop comprises a run of over 550 miles, every mile of which is interesting.

Approach to the Gaspé is now from two directions only. Those driving northeast along the St. Lawrence River should cross at Quebec to the south side and follow this bank through Rivière-du-Loup and Rimouski to the beginning of the Perron Boulevard at Ste. Flavie. Motorists traveling this way will usually keep to the shore of the St. Lawrence, swinging around the peninsula from west to east. From the dramatic point of view, this is a mistake as the most thrilling scenery comes first, leaving the trip along the south shore as something of a scenic anticlimax. Many drivers prefer this route, however, because for miles along the north shore the road is merely a shelf in the cliffs high above the St. Lawrence and, when vehicles come against a more or less timid driver, he feels safer with the wall of a cliff on his right than with the edge of a road overhanging water far below. There is really no danger, however, unless a driver completely loses his head.

Through New Brunswick.

Motorists from St. John, Fredericton and other parts of Southern New Brunswick will naturally drive toward the Gaspé along Route 11, which is the only good road at present that approaches the peninsula from the south. This course will bring them to Matapédia along an attractive road that skirts the south shore of Baie des Chaleurs.

The Gaspé Peninsula may be reached by ferry from Campbellton, or by the road that runs to the head of the bay.

Matapédia is not only the junction point of Route 11 and the Perron Boulevard, but also an important railway centre. Here is located a good, modern hotel, thus making it an excellent spot at which to remain overnight.

Turning eastward along the main highway that skirts the south shore of Gaspé, the tourist soon comes to Ristigouche, which is the principal reserve of the little-known tribe of Micmac Indians. About 300 of these aborigines now reside there.

Next come the lumbering and fishing villages of Mann, Escuminac and Nouvelle, followed very shortly by the popular shore resort of Carleton. Here is located one of the finest bathing beaches on the peninsula. Suitable hotel and boarding house accommodations are available.

Not far beyond is Maria, another resort, followed by New Richmond, one of the most important municipalities on the south shore. Farming, dairying and lumbering are important industries here, while tourists will find ample opportunity for fishing, bathing and other outdoor sports.

After driving through several more picturesque villages, the traveler comes to New Carlisle, an important commercial centre and railway terminus. Tourists find this town an excellent place at which to tarry. Bathing, boating, trout and deep-sea fishing, golf, tennis and big-game hunting are all available. The beautiful lake district of New Carlisle, easily accessible by a good road, is one of the most delightful camping grounds of the Gaspé Peninsula.

Just beyond New Carlisle is Paspebiac, another popular resort; then, after a few miles, one comes to the important fishing centre of Port Daniel. Here the Provincial Government maintains a fish hatchery. Several other fishing villages are now passed through before coming to Chandler, where there is a pulp mill and ample hotel and garage accommodations for the passing tourist. More fishing villages—then, off to the east is Percé, one of the most picturesque villages of the peninsula.

Not far beyond Percé the motorist cuts across another point of land and then follows the shore of Gaspé Bay through Douglastown to the town of Gaspé. The town of Gaspé may also be reached by ferry across the bar. Historically and commercially, this town is one of the most important on the peninsula and it is also popular as a Summer resort.

Its harbor is nearer to Europe than any other on the North American Continent, and it has been pointed out that a direct railway connection with Quebec would greatly shorten the time and water distance between that city and Liverpool.

A short drive across another point of land brings the tourist to the north shore of the Gaspé Peninsula, where he will turn westward along what is undoubtedly one of the most spectacular shore drives to be found anywhere in the world. High cliffs border the sea at all points.

Sometimes the road runs along the foot of a cliff, again it winds upward along the face of frowning bluffs until it is suspended hundreds of feet in the air. Careful driving is necessary, and good brakes are essential as some of the grades are exceedingly steep, with many twists and turns. The views are magnificent everywhere.

The villages are further apart along this part of the route, the principal industry of the inhabitants being fishing, but there is also lumbering and mixed farming. Good beaches are not plentiful along this shore line, but there is one at Ste. Anne des Monts, where hotel and boarding house accommodations will also be found.

When the traveler reaches Matane he is approaching the end of this remarkable highway. Matane is an active town of some 4,000 inhabitants that boasts a fine, shady beach. Here one finds an excellent modern hotel.

Another resort of prominence is Metis-sur-Mer, after which comes Ste. Flavie, where the highway along the north shore joins that leading northwest from Matapédia across the base of the peninsula. Here the tourist will either continue along the shore of the St. Lawrence River to Rivière du Loup and Quebec, or else turn left through the Matapédia Valley to Matapédia, thus completing a circuit that will always remain in his memory as one of the outstanding drives of his motoring career.

TREATMENT OF OILS MORE IMPORTANT THAN SOURCE

GOOD lubricating oils for automobiles are made, not found, according to the almost unanimous opinion of 104 professors of organic chemistry in American universities gathered by the New York University Bureau of Business Research. The information gleaned is that the source of lubricating oils is not important provided they are treated by the proper process. It is to the public's advantage, therefore, to patronize the reputable oil companies.

The development of the high compression automotive engine has put greater and greater demands upon the lubricating industry, but, according to the authorities on organic chemistry, the industry has responded by establishing its mastery over crudes and proving its ability to work its will with them.

FAMOUS AMERICAN GENERAL.

AS a sample of the acquaintance of little Dutch schoolboys with American military fame a newspaper in Holland recently printed the following item:

A teacher asked his class to name a famous German General. Immediately all the boys raised their hands and shouted, "Hindenburg!" Then he asked the same question applied to France. Every pupil shouted, "Foch!" When he extended the test to Great Britain many of the boys answered, "Douglas Haig." Now came the query, "And who can name a great American General?" After a few moments of hesitation one boy timidly suggested, "General Motors!"

AT THE WHEEL

By JAMES O. SPEARING

UNLESS too many motorists try to enjoy it at the same time, what may be described as the Connecticut Shore Road Trip is good for an outing any agreeable afternoon. The road runs for about twenty miles between Darien and Fairfield, close to the Sound, winding among trees that softly shadow the way when it is not actually skirting the water's edge. Magnificent estates displaying green lawns and gardens to the appreciative eye cause the driver, who is not driven by an aimless urge to speed, instinctively to remove his foot from the accelerator. Bathing beaches not usually too crowded for relaxation may entice one to park for an hour or two while he suns himself on the sand between plunges in the cool, clean water of Long Island Sound.

For this trip, leave the Boston Post Road at Darien, following the street car tracks that turn right just before the Post Road passes under the railroad bridge near the centre of the town. Signs indicating South Norwalk are easily followed, with the route number, 335, occasionally appearing to keep one sure of the way. Rowayton comes first and then South Norwalk itself, where, directional signs being most needed, as usual, they disappear. Entering South Norwalk, the motorist will find himself on South Main Street, and if he turns off this thoroughfare, to the right, directly under the railroad bridge to which it leads him, he won't get lost. As he clears the town, he will come to a fork where a sign will direct him to Saugatuck and Southport.

The road, still 335, continues along the shore, through Saugatuck, Compo Beach and Southport, and finally returns to the Post Road in Westport. A few miles further on, in Fairfield, turn off the Post Road again and run down to Fairfield Beach. This brief return to the Post Road is not necessary if you can find the obscure way that continues beyond Southport along the Sound into Old Fairfield, but the driver making this trip for the first time is almost certain to miss it unless he can persuade a native to do duty for the directional sign that isn't there. The signs marked "Fairfield" will send him back to the Post Road.

Except for the necessity of getting through South Norwalk, it really isn't necessary for one to bother about signs and directions on this trip, after leaving the Post Road in Darien. If the motorist will always keep as close to the Sound as possible, he will find his way through charming country to Fairfield. This means, when in doubt, turn right. Some of the roads leading off to the right come to dead ends at the water's edge, but that only means another view of beach or rocks, a little breeze with salt in it, and the pleasant time it takes to return to the onward-going road again. Many of those familiar with the way deliberately take these side roads to the Sound merely to add a few miles to the trip. Its only shortcoming is that it's much too short.

Most motorists going up through Eastern Connecticut leave New York by the Hutchinson River Parkway, but not all of them dodge Port Chester on the way out. The parkway ends in Westchester Avenue, marked as route 119, where those seeking the Boston Post Road turn right. About two and a half miles beyond the point where the parkway ends, one should look for a sign on the right pointing left to Greenwich and New Haven. The turn, which is under a traffic light, is into North Regent Street, and, in addition to the sign, there are car tracks swinging left to guide one. Without regard for signs, one can follow these tracks to their end opposite Putnam Avenue. Keep straight on into Putnam Avenue and it will lead you into the Post Road about two miles south of the centre of Greenwich.

Those who wish to return to New York City by this route should watch for this fork south of Greenwich, where a sign indicating New York, White Plains and Tarrytown directs one off the Post Road to the right. The car tracks will be picked up in North Regent Street and may be followed easily to Westchester Avenue, where, of course, a right turn heads one for the Hutchinson River Parkway or the Bronx River Parkway beyond. Occasional signs on Putnam Avenue and North Regent Street, marked "Hutchinson River Parkway," serve to keep one reassured.

The problem of getting from the southern end of the Hutchinson River Parkway through the Bronx into Manhattan is something else again. It's not so difficult for those who want to come down the west side of the city. They leave the Post Road on one of the thoroughfares that crosses the top of the Bronx—Gun Hill Road, perhaps—and come down Broadway and Riverside Drive. But those who want to reach the east side of Manhattan have no such straight and open way. So far, a search for the best route has yielded no satisfactory result. The search will be continued, and, meanwhile, the reward of gratitude is offered to any one who can point out a good way from, say, the Willis Avenue Bridge to the beginning of the parkway.

ALONG THE PERRON BOULEVARD

By E. B. HOLTON.

GASPE, remote and heretofore inaccessible, frontier of the simple life, is open to the motoring tourist. It is a section of the Province of Quebec situated about 400 miles east of the city of Quebec. It is a part of the British Empire, but a visitor must reassure himself of the fact time and again as he drives through the region. The language of the natives is French; the town names are French. Even the scenery is unlike that of any other section of Eastern Canada.

Perron Boulevard is the highway that circumscribes the Gaspé Peninsula. For many miles this highway swings along the edge of cliffs. It winds and twists up and down and around hills and it revels in sharp turns. It is not a dangerous route, but it does demand an alert mind and a skilled hand at the wheel.

A seacoast along the foot of towering mountains! The Shickshocks, part of the mighty Appalachian range that sprawls across the United States from Georgia to Maine, rise 4,400 feet to serve Gaspé as a rocky backbone. Mountains climb sheer out of the sea. They crowd close to the wave-washed shore, and not only for a few paltry miles. This magnificent seacoast extends for hundreds of miles and is, in the opinion of many, the most breath-taking and awe-inspiring panorama of land and sea on the North American continent.

Entering Gaspé at Matapédia, the first town passed through is Escuminac. Fishing boats bob at anchor in the dancing waters of Baie des Chaleurs on the right, while on the left are fields laid out as if by rule, fenced off and ranging far back to the foothills and slopes of the Shickshocks. Ahead is a far-flung view of the mountain crests, a delicate half-tone in misty blues that fade into the distance.

The land flattens out as the mountains recede toward the left; fishing villages are passed at regular intervals. Now and then a shallow and broad river meanders down from the hills; stray logs dot the surfaces of limpid streams.

Tramp steamers at tiny docks impatiently await the finished rolls of print paper that come from the mills at the mouth of each river. They drop down the tide, headed toward the United States and its ravenous newspaper presses.

Anse du Gascon, Newport, then Anse du Cap, loom and drop behind. Percé is not far ahead. Of a sudden you top Surprise Hill and Percé Rock bursts upon you. This is a massive freak of nature, a gigantic rock, broken from the mainland and rising sheer from the water for 200 feet. It is shaped like the hull of a mighty Leviathan and in its outer end a hole has been worn by the action of the sea; hence the name, meaning pierced rock. At low tide rowboats carry visitors to the rock. They walk through the stone arch, which is 50 feet in height.

Gaspé, the town, is forty miles beyond. It offers a delightfully cool Summer climate to visitors and a wonderful hunting and fishing region to sportsmen.

From St. Marjorique to Rivière au Renard, the Perron Boulevard deserts the sea and cuts across through mountains. The road winds in and out, following forest-clad passes that rival those of the Great Smokies in North Carolina and Tennessee.

Beginning at Rivière au Renard, the marvelous scenery along the Gulf of St. Lawrence spreads before the traveler; here the beauty of Gaspé reaches a magnificent climax. For the next 100 miles, as far as Ste. Anne des Monts, the road is a giant roller coaster that dips and soars as it follows the contours of the uptilted country. The hills come in vast green waves. Hardly ever is the St. Lawrence out of sight. One moment the road is high above it, then, with a swoop, the highway drops to the water's edge and squeezes its way through a narrow shelf of land just above high-tide mark. On one side are frowning and precipitous cliffs, on the other the breaking waves of the gulf.

Natives at Home.

Not alone is the scenery entrancing. The tiny and tidy fishing villages also have their charm. Regularly as clockwork, a cluster of houses appears every four miles. Each village has its church dominating the landscape and each village has its wee harbor, with boats at anchor in the quiet water behind a protecting reef of rock. Houses are of one pattern, painted white and with wide eaves. They have been built sturdily to endure.

Gaspé is a country that is self-supporting. Fishing is the chief industry, but each home has its vegetable patch, its cow and flock of sheep and its pen of grunting pigs.

A usual sight in this remote section is outdoor bake ovens of brick and mud. One also occasionally sees carts drawn by dogs singly and in teams, the vehicles loaded with rattling milk cans or squat bags of flour.

Even after Ste. Anne des Monts is passed and the country levels out, the scenery holds interest. Far across the Gulf of St. Lawrence there is a jagged sky line; it is a section of the province that has not been opened to motor travel. Beyond Metane, houses are more frequent. Metis-sur-Mer is a popular Summer resort with hotels and cottages and Rimouski offers several good hotels.

An Unspoiled Country.

Though French is the language on Gaspé, have no fear that natives will not understand English. A few words, enforced with sign language, will secure necessities. The inhabitants are cheerful and polite; visitors will find them responsive to a friendly wave of greeting. Gas, oil and other necessities for the car will be found in every village on Gaspé, but service stations and automobile agencies are few and far between up that way.

If you are tired of scenery that is profaned by gaudy billboards and marred by the tawdry pop stands; if you want to get away from blinking traffic lights and the shrill toot of the policeman's whistle, head for Gaspé. Go before the simple charm is rubbed off by thoughtless tourists who usually spoil the simplicity of any country and the friendliness of natives, after a while.

More Lights for Fifth Avenue—Progressive System to Be Tried—Conditions in Maine

THE installation of traffic lights at every street intersection in Fifth Avenue will be completed by Sept. 1, it was learned last week, and the Police Department will then be equipped to try out a true progressive system of vehicle control. The "stagger" plan now being introduced on cross-town streets is not a true progressive system and cannot be, because the progressive system, by which automobiles move steadily in groups with no stops, requires traffic lights at all intersections. It also requires a complicated system of wiring and the use of alternating current, whereas throughout the centre of Manhattan direct current is in use. The new lights on Fifth Avenue will be wired for the use of alternating current.

It was explained last week by First Deputy Police Commissioner Philip D. Hoyt that it was only by the gradual installation of necessary mechanical equipment that the ideal of traffic regulation could be achieved. The department is attempting everything possible under existing conditions, he said, and is changing conditions to meet traffic needs as rapidly as possible.

Conditions in Maine.

ALTHOUGH there are many sections of Maine highways under improvement, most of the work is being carried on without detouring traffic. Tourists will find work under way at the various points listed below:

U. S. 1—(Kittery to Van Buren)—Brunswick, 4.16 miles, concrete, travel allowed; Woolwich, 1.8 miles, concrete, travel allowed; Thomaston to Warren, 2 miles, concrete, travel allowed; Rockland, 1.12 miles, bituminous macadam, travel allowed; Jonesboro to Machias, 5.57 miles, gravel, detour through Whitneyville; Grand Isle, 4.48 miles, gravel, travel allowed.

U. S. 2—(Gorham, N. H., to Houlton)—Rumford, concrete, travel allowed; Wilton to Dixfield, 3.5 miles of gravel, travel allowed; Dixfield, 2.76 miles, gravel, travel allowed, traffic may avoid these stretches by routing over Road 107 from Wilton to Brettun's Mills, then on 108 into Dixfield; Newport, 1 mile, concrete, travel allowed; Hermon to Carmel, 3.75 miles, concrete, short detour.

MAINE 101—Union, 2 miles, gravel, travel allowed; Rockland to Rockport, 3.2 miles, gravel, travel allowed.

MAINE 102—China, 2 miles gravel, travel allowed; Searsmont, 1 mile, gravel, suggested detour Liberty-South Montville-Searsmont and Belmont Corners.

U. S. 201—(Brunswick to Quebec line)—Moscow to Caratunk, 7.6 miles, gravel, new location, old road in use; Moscow, 4 miles, gravel, travel allowed; Bingham, 1.7 miles, bituminous macadam, travel allowed.

Glens Falls-Lake George.

IT was unofficially reported last week that the section of Route 9 between Glens Falls and Lake George, which has been under construction for some time, is now practically completed and in condition for speedy and comfortable use. The latest official report of the State Highway Department, issued on July 15, states that, on this section, "work is in progress with some delay."

To Take Away Licenses.

ALL organized police forces in Connecticut have been requested by Commissioner of Motor Vehicles Robbins B. Stoeckel to take away the licenses of all operators arrested for operating while intoxicated, for reckless driving when there is evidence that the operator has been drinking intoxicants, and for evading responsibility. These licenses will be returned only upon order of the commissioner, who plans to investigate each case thoroughly.

Letters delegating to all policemen the authority of the commissioner to take licenses have been sent to Commissioner Robert T. Hurley of the State police and all chiefs of police.

This new practice will go into effect immediately. It is primarily designed, according to Commissioner Stoeckel, to make certain that those who have demonstrated by their actions that they may be dangerous persons on the highway shall not be allowed to drive while disposition of their cases is pending in the courts.

Parking Ban Questioned.

BUSINESS men and merchants in the Rockaways have petitioned police authorities to lift the ban on boulevard parking on Saturdays, Sundays and holidays. They aver that it is a detriment to business on the main thoroughfare. Police officials, however, claim that since its installation, the first week-end in July, the parking ban has helped the traffic problem in the Rockaways. The final link in the boulevard paving was completed last week, making it a wide thoroughfare which is kept clear by the new rule.

Park Booklet Ready.

A BOOKLET describing the State parks, published by the State Council of Parks, has been completed and is now available for general distribution. It may be obtained from the State Council offices at 302 Broadway, New York City, and at Albany. The booklet has 132 pages and is illustrated. It tells in brief where the parks are located, how they may be reached and what may be expected in the way of camping and recreational facilities. Road maps are included in it.

Better Ferry Service.

MOTORISTS using the Ninety-second Street ferry will no longer be subjected to unnecessary delay and inconvenience caused by having to alight from their cars to purchase ferry tickets. Additional booths for the sale of tickets have been placed at the street curb on the approach to the ferry slip.

The New York Automobile Club recently called attention to the lack of such booths and Albert Goldman, Commissioner of Plant and Structures, had them installed. Mr. Goldman has also directed the reconstruction of the Astoria terminal of the ferry.

In Virginia.

CONSTRUCTION work is hampering travel on U. S. 211, in Virginia. This is the Washington-New Market route into the Shenandoah valley. Other routes into the famous cavern section of the Old Dominion State are open. Brief outlines of routes under construction in Virginia will be found below:

U. S. 340—(Frederick, Md., to Winchester)—West Virgina line to Gaylord and Berryville, 7-mile detour in fair condition.

U. S. 11—(Shenandoah Valley Pike)—Widening operations, Tom's Brock to Maurertown, north of Mount Jackson, south of Harrisonburg; closed, Dublin to Pulaski, 8.5-mile detour in fair condition; Marion, new location, caution for blasting.

U. S. 60—(Midland Trail)—Newport News-Lee Hall, traffic maintained by cross-overs and by-passes; Londale Furnace-Clifton Forge, traffic maintained.

VIRGINIA 18—(Amherst-Lynchburg)—Detour, ten miles rough and slippery in wet weather.

U. S. 1—(Washington to North Carolina line)—Alexandria to Mount Vernon, traffic maintained on by-passes and cross-overs.

THE NEW YORK SPEED LAW

No Limit Imposed but More Than Thirty Miles an Hour Presumptive Evidence of Carelessness

MANY motorists are under the impression that the legal automobile speed limit on highways in New York State is thirty miles an hour. Others have heard that there is no definite limit but that more than thirty miles an hour is "presumptive evidence" of a lack of care and prudence in driving, though they have a rather vague idea as to just what this means. To clear up these and other points related to the operation of automobiles, Hamilton Ward, Attorney General of the State, was asked for an explanation of the law, and he supplied the following unofficial statement.

I AM somewhat surprised that so much interest has been aroused by a routine statement made in an opinion which I recently gave to the Controller, to the effect that there is no speed limit in the law of New York State. This has been the fact for twenty years, since the enactment of Chapter 374 of the Laws of 1910.

> No person shall operate a motor vehicle on a public highway at a rate of speed greater than is reasonable and proper, having regard to the traffic and use of the highway, or so as to endanger the life or limb of any person, or the safety of any property; or in any event on any public highway where the territory contiguous thereto is closely built up, at a greater rate than one mile in six minutes, or elsewhere in a city or village at a greater rate than one mile in four minutes, or elsewhere outside of a city or village at a greater rate than one mile in three minutes; subject, however, to the other provisions of this article.

This was changed in 1910 to read as follows:

> Every person operating a motor vehicle on the public highway of this State shall drive the same in a careful and prudent manner and at a rate of speed so as not to endanger the property of another or the life or limb of any person; provided, that a rate of speed in excess of thirty miles an hour for a distance of one-fourth of a mile shall be presumptive evidence of driving at a rate of speed which is not careful and prudent.

In 1922 the section was amended to take the form it still retains, though it is now Section 56 of the vehicle and traffic law, enacted in 1929, namely:

> 1. Every person operating a motor vehicle upon a public highway shall drive such vehicle in a careful and prudent manner and at a rate of speed so as not to endanger the property of another or the life or limb of any person.
> 2. A rate of speed, by a motor vehicle other than a motor truck, in excess of thirty miles an hour for a distance of one-fourth of a mile, shall be presumptive evidence of driving at a rate of speed which is not careful and prudent.
> 3. Except as hereinafter provided, a rate of speed by a motor truck of two tons capacity or under in excess of twenty miles an hour shall be presumptive evidence of driving at a rate of speed which is not careful and prudent.
> 4. Except as hereinafter provided, a rate of speed by a motor truck of over two tons capacity in excess of fifteen miles an hour shall be presumptive evidence of driving at a rate of speed which is not careful and prudent.
> 5. A motor truck equipped with pneumatic tires may be driven at a rate of speed of five miles an hour in excess of the rate of speed specified in subdivision 3 or 4, for a truck of the same capacity, before such rate of speed shall be presumptive evidence of driving at a rate of speed which is not careful and prudent.

Care Required.

It will be noted that "careful and prudent" driving is all that this section requires, and violation thereof is, under subdivision 4 of Section 70, a misdemeanor punishable by a fine not exceeding $100 or by imprisonment for not exceeding thirty days, or both such fine and imprisonment. "Reckless driving" is an altogether different offense, under Section 58 of the vehicle and traffic law, which defines it as using a motor vehicle "or any appliance or accessory thereof * * * in a manner which unnecessarily interferes with the free and proper use of the public highway or unnecessarily endangers users of the public highway." This offense is a misdemeanor, punished by a fine not exceeding $50 for the first offense, and for a second or subsequent offense by a fine not exceeding $50 or imprisonment not exceeding six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

In the section defining reckless driving nothing is said of speed or of "presumptions." The latter, as employed in Section 56, appear to need some clarification to the lay mind. The effect of a presumption, as thus established, is that it shifts the burden of proof from the State to the defendant. Bearing in mind that the offense under this section consists of driving in a manner that is not careful and prudent, no matter what the speed might have been, whether five miles an hour or ninety, if the prosecution can establish that the speed was in fact in excess of thirty miles an hour it will be presumed that the defendant was careless and imprudent, and the burden then rests on him to show that he was not. But every such presumption is subject to being overturned by the evidence.

A good example of how this works is found in People v. Nellen, 104 Misc. 355, decided in Nassau County Court in 1918. There was no dispute about the facts. The officer charged that the defendant was driving at a rate of forty-two miles per hour. The defendant admitted that he was driving at about that speed. The Merrick Road at the place where the arrest was made is not within an incorporated village, not thickly populated and it appears from the record in the case that only one other vehicle was upon the road just previous to the arrest in the vicinity where it was made. The motorcycle officer frankly stated upon cross-examination that the only reason he stopped the defendant was that the defendant was traveling forty-two miles an hour.

The defendant testified in his own behalf and stated that at the time in question he was returning from Camp Upton; that it was a clear, bright day. Going through villages he observed what he understood to be the rate of speed permissible and upon the clear, straight stretches of the road he increased his speed; that there were no pedestrians near the place where he was arrested upon the road; that the brakes and tires upon his car were in perfect condition; that his car was at all times under his control; that he had been driving automobiles for five years, having driven nearly 30,000 miles; that he had driven in cities and never had an accident; that at the time in question there was nothing in the way to obstruct his view; that, as he came to a curve in the road, he reduced his speed somewhat.

The court said:

> The officer seems to have proceeded upon the theory that a speed in excess of thirty miles an hour in and of itself constitutes a violation of Section 287 of the highway law. I am convinced from the record in this case that the justice of the peace also proceeded upon the same theory. The question presented is whether or not the record in this case establishes beyond reasonable doubt that the defendant at the time and place in question was driving his car in such a manner as to endanger the property of another or the life or limb of any person. Section 287 of the Highway law does not prohibit a rate of speed in excess of thirty miles an hour. * * *
> I think it is quite clear from a reference to the old and the new statute that the Legislature intended to eliminate the absolute prohibition of speed greater than a specified number of miles per hour and to shift the burden upon the defendant, in the case where the speed was shown to be over thirty miles per hour, of showing that under all the circumstances he was not driving in a reckless or imprudent manner. In other words, the mere fact of speed in excess of thirty miles an hour simply raises a presumption of imprudent driving which may be overcome by evidence. In this case, I think the record clearly establishes that the presumption of careless and imprudent driving at the time and place in question on the part of the defendant was clearly and fully overcome by the testimony of not only the defendant but the officer who was the complaining witness.
> The judgment of conviction is therefore reversed, and the fine remitted.

So also it was held in Erie County Court in 1924 in People v. Carrie, 122 Misc. 753, that convictions of two drivers of motor vehicles should be reversed and the cases dismissed where it appeared that they were arrested between 2:30 and 3:30 A. M., while driving through a village, the one at about forty-five miles an hour, the other at about forty-eight miles an hour; that there was no other traffic or pedestrians on the road, which was straight for about two miles, and that both automobiles were in good repair and both defendants were drivers of experience.

Local Regulations and Fines.

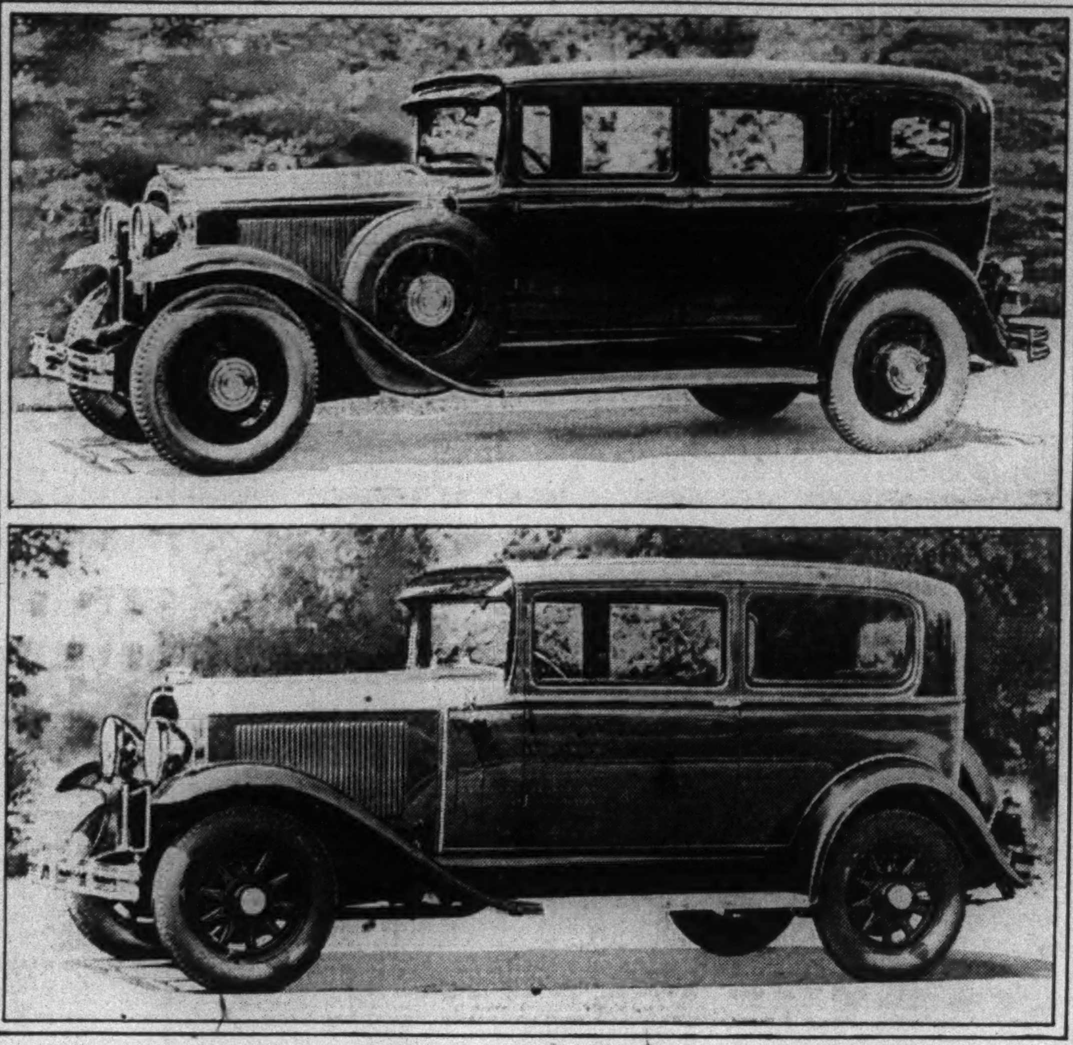
An entirely different subject is presented in connection with local municipal ordinances governing speed. New York, Buffalo, Rochester, Yonkers and Mount Vernon make their own rules on this subject, and other cities and villages may, under conditions prescribed in Section 54 of the vehicle and traffic law, establish a speed limitation "not to be in any case less than one mile in three minutes," the punishment for violation of which shall not, except in cities of the first or second class, exceed a fine of $100 or imprisonment for thirty days or both such fine and imprisonment. This privilege relates to the regulation of speed alone, as the moment the question arises of careful or prudent driving, or of reckless driving, no matter what the speed, the State law is involved, and where an offense is charged which is covered by the State law, that statute alone is applicable.

This brings up the question of the disposition of fines collected for traffic violations. Section 73 of the vehicle and traffic law provides that all such fines collected for violations of Sections 1 to 72 of that law shall be paid over monthly to the State Controller. Court rulings have established the exception that fines collected for violation of local speed ordinances belong to the locality, but the Legislature has added the further limitation that, in the case of villages, a village shall be entitled to retain from fines imposed for speeding only $1 per annum per capita of its population, being obliged to turn the balance over to the State, all such moneys received by the State being required by law to be used for the maintenance and repair of improved roads.

Towns, which term includes all territory outside of cities and incorporated villages, have no power to enact speed ordinances, but where arrests are made therein by State troopers for violations of Sections 1-72 of the vehicle and traffic law the State Controller reimburses the local justices for their fees.

Sections 1-72 of the statute, fines for violation of which belong to the State, cover all matters relative to registration, licenses, plates, equipment, weight, insurance of buses, careless or reckless driving, stolen or unclaimed cars, altered engine numbers, failure to report accidents, &c. Fines for violation of Sections 80-93, governing operation of vehicles, right of way, signals, parking, &c., outside of New York City, are specifically reserved to the city, town or village in which they are collected.

TWO OF THE NEW EIGHT-CYLINDER BUICKS



The Seven-Passenger Sedan of the 8-90 Series of Buick Straight Eights, the Largest of the Line, Is Pictured Above, and Below It Is the Two-Door Sedan of the Small 8-50 Group.

BUICK NOW A STRAIGHT EIGHT

FOUR series of Buick automobiles powered by straight eight motors were announced yesterday. These are the only cars with power plants of this type produced within the General Motors Corporation. All the other eight-cylinder cars manufactured by divisions of the corporation have V-type engines.

The new Buicks comprise the company's entire line, replacing the six-cylinder cars bearing the company name and also the six-cylinder Marquette. The valve-in-head feature of the Buick motor has been retained throughout the line, however, and, although certain structural improvements have been made in body design, the 1931 Buicks do not depart in general appearance from their 1930 predecessors. The only observable difference is a radiator cap bearing the figure eight.

The 1931 Buicks are offered in twenty models of four wheel-base lengths. Prices range from $1,035 for the smallest to $2,035 for the largest.

There are six models in what is known as the 8-50 series. The motor of this series has a bore and stroke of 2⅞ by 4¼ inches, capable of 76½ horsepower and a car speed of seventy-five miles an hour. The wheel base is 114 inches.

The next larger size is the 8-60 series on a wheel base of 118 inches in which five models are included. The motor of this series has a bore and stroke of 3 1-16 by 4⅝ inches. It develops ninety horsepower and a car speed of eighty miles an hour.

The 8-80 series, with two models, has a wheelbase of 124 inches, and the wheelbase of the 8-90 series, with seven models, is 132 inches. Both these series have the same motor. It develops 104 horsepower and a car speed of 80 miles an hour with a bore and stroke 3 5-16 by 5 inches.

Buick has adopted other mechanical changes in addition to the eight-in-line motor. All the cars are equipped with an engine oil temperature regulator and the three larger series have a Buick-developed syncro-mesh transmission.

The construction principle of the engine oil temperature regulator is the same as that used in the radiator. All oil going to the bearings is passed through a water-jacketed core. This not only cools the oil at high speeds but warms it after starting the motor in cold weather.

The syncro-mesh transmission permits a smooth and quiet shifting of gears, including from high to second at advanced speed. With this device, second speed gears are in constant mesh. Shifting is controlled by a syncronizing mechanism which consists of a sliding gear clutch and engaging friction cones.

On the larger motors of the 8-60, 8-80 and 8-90 series, dual carburetors and manifolds are used. Each carburetor feeds four cylinders.

All bearings and working parts in the new Buick motors are lubricated by pressure directly from the oil pump and filter, and they are also equipped with a combination silencer and air cleaner which is said to muffle intake noises, thus giving silent operation throughout the speed range.

Other mechanical features of the 1931 Buick are a new cooling system with thermostatically controlled shutters, a new method of assembling the radiator shutters, a new crankcase ventilating system, a new brake hook-up that gives better braking and permits easy adjustment, and an improved steering assembly.

The Fisher bodies have been strengthened and redesigned for the elimination of noise. Instrument boards and panels are new. Front seats, which are adjustable, are lower with deeper cushions. In upholstery and colors the cars are said to represent the latest trends.

IN THE AUTOMOBILE INDUSTRY

PLANS to promote safe and courteous driving by operators of commercial vehicles were endorsed at a conference of the Truck Association Executives of America, Eastern Division, held recently in the Ansonia Hotel, New York. H. C. Kelting of Louisville, Ky., chairman of the association, said that "the prosperity of the truck industry, both present and future, depends upon convincing the public that the truck is not the menace nor the nuisance that it is generally believed to be."

The Moto Meter Gauge and Equipment Corporation of Long Island City, N. Y., has introduced a new hydraulic shock absorber. The device is said to provide a combination of free spring movement on smooth roads, with vigorous spring dampening and protection on rough roads. The corporation has also added to its list of automobile accessories a motolever operating as an extension handle to release and pull back or push forward the bottom-type emergency brake on the Model A Ford.

Larger Motor in Chrysler "70."

THE Chrysler Sales Corporation has announced that the ninety-three-horsepower six-cylinder engine formerly used in the "77" models is now standard equipment in all cars of the "70" series. Down-draft carburetion and four-speed transmission with multi-range gear shift continue as features of this motor. The "77" series has been superseded by the Chrysler eight.

At the same time prices on four "70" models have been reduced. The following figures show the old and new prices; Royal sedan, old price, $1,445, new, $1,295; royal coupé, old, $1,395, new, $1,295; brougham, old, $1,345, new, $1,245; business coupé, old, $1,345, new, $1,245.

New Day-Elder Trucks.

A COMPLETE new line of modern "super-service sixes" comprising a range of eleven individual models of Day-Elder trucks has been announced by the National Motors Manufacturing Company of Irvington, N. J. Production has been under way for the past month and deliveries are promised for the beginning of August. The outer designs with chromium plated fixtures have been given special attention and the enclosed cabs are of all-weather de luxe type upholstered in genuine leather.

Great public interest has been shown in the "free wheeling" Studebaker models since their recent introduction, it is reported. Lieut. Col. Charles Kingsford-Smith, who recently flew across the Atlantic, purchased one of the new cars upon arriving in San Francisco. It is a President Eight brougham and will be shipped to Sydney, Australia, for him.

Truck on St. Helena.

FOR the first time in the history of that small but famous piece of land, the island of St. Helena, a motor car has made its appearance. The automobile has long been barred from the island, but opposition has been overcome at last by the St. Helena Corporation, Ltd., importers and exporters, who use the vehicle for collecting raw material from their plantations and carting prepared hemp from the mills to the wharf. The car is a Chevrolet truck.

E. L. Richards, export manager of the LaFrance Republic Corporation of Alma, Mich., makers of trucks, has recently returned from a four months' trip through the principal cities of Cuba, Mexico, Central and South America. He reports that, "regardless of the general depression existing at the present time in varying degrees throughout Latin America, the future outlook is promising."

THE NEWS FROM DETROIT

By FRED KINGSBURY.

DETROIT.

WITH several of the automobile plants in the Detroit district still closed, either for inventories or annual vacations, production remains at a rather low figure, although factories which have announced models recently are going ahead at a rapid rate to furnish cars to dealers throughout the country.

Considerable talk has been heard in Detroit during the past week regarding a sixteen-cylinder car which will be manufactured by a company outside the Detroit district, and which will be announced in the not far distant future. The Cadillac company is the only concern making a sixteen-cylinder car in Michigan.

The four-cylinder car is holding its own remarkably well this year. Two factories making this type of automobile in Detroit report high sales figures. So far as six and eight cylinder units are concerned, however, the manufacturing picture has been changing during the past two years and it is freely predicted that still more six-cylinder makers will enter the eight-cylinder field.

Manufacturers of small commercial vehicles report increased sales during the past week. The truck business has not been active for four or five weeks, and sales of heavy duty trucks have been at a low ebb. However, these manufacturers are reporting more activity and are looking forward to increased Fall business.

Oil cooling systems on automobile engines are occupying the attention of parts manufacturers and they are going ahead with many experiments.

One or two of the manufacturers say they are having more calls for disk wheel equipment, and they are watching this trend closely. The wood and disk wheels were the popular types a few years ago. However, wire wheels have "cut in" during the past year and a half at a rapid rate and are very popular at the present time.

CHOOSING A MOTOR BOAT

Selection of Craft Should Be Determined by Conditions of Use—Advice to Novices

By JAMES KIRSHNER.

THE choice of a boat is governed not only by the available cash but also by the water in which the vessel is to be used, the kind of use it is to get and the time one has at his disposal for its use.

For instance, a small outboard power boat or a one-design centreboard sloop makes an ideal craft for getting around in a protected place. In more exposed waters, for short trips, a larger runabout with plenty of flare, a catboat or keel sloop would be necessary.

Where the purchaser has plenty of time in which to use a boat, the cabin type of motor boat, cat, sloop or yawl is advised. An auxiliary centreboard sloop with cruising accommodations is a good all-around boat.

For those who want a power boat only, the sea-skiff type of cruiser, either "V," semi-round or conventional sea-skiff flat-bottom, is good. These boats make fair time with light power and can be driven at high speeds if sufficiently powered.

There are also a number of small, well-designed round-bottom stock cruisers which make ideal craft for one-day or extended cruises.

Great South Bay, by reason of its shallowness and eel grass, requires a shoal-draught boat. Here an auxiliary cat or a shallow-draught power boat is best.

Long Island Sound is deep and subject to exposed conditions. If one wants to stay out no matter how it blows, a large cruiser or keel auxiliary is best.

It is the habit of many boat owners to start with a second-hand boat until they are sure of themselves. Later, if conditions permit, they usually get a new stock boat.

Depreciation, even on a new boat, is not great. I would estimate it 25 per cent after two years, then about 5 per cent a year for the next five or ten years. I know of motor boats twenty and thirty years old still on the water and giving good service.

Usually the buyer of a second-hand boat as a trial horse can, after a season or two, get a better idea of just what he wants. He has by that time definite desires which he will find pretty well incorporated in one stock model or another. Or he can have a builder incorporate his ideas in a special boat.

NOTES ABOUT BOATS.

THE annual motor boat show sponsored by the National Association of Engine and Boat Manufacturers will be held at the Grand Central Palace, New York City, Jan. 16 to 24, 1931. Although four floors of the building have been contracted for, surveys indicate that exhibitors will be forced to accept limited space so that all branches of the industry may be represented.

An increase of 100 per cent in runabout sales over 1929 has been made by the Stearns Marine Service Company of Boston, the New England distributers for Gar Wood boats, according to figures released by factory representatives.

A CRUISE IN A CABRIOLET

By EDNA MEAD.

THE Second-in-Command was at the wheel the other day, which is no proper place for the fellow who's keeping log on any well-conducted craft, even if it is a cabriolet instead of a cruiser. Yet it is just the remnant glimpses gleaned from pages cold with mileages that weave the real spell of many such voyages as this between Manhattan and the mountains.

Sunday in July—7 in the morning—starting in a rainstorm. Mists over Spuyten Duyvil Creek and the Harlem River water beaten frothy by the downpour as we pass across the Broadway bridge. Long queues of umbrella-eclipsed humans scuttling home from early masses all along the Albany Post Road.

Street signs on this highway as we skim through Sleepy Hollow are fascinating. They peer whitely out of the fog at every corner, each showing a wildly riding, silhouetted figure of Irving's headless horseman.

Past Tarrytown, still the shrouding rain, and, in consequence, a brand-new thrill, an almost empty Post Road! We might be headless horsemen ourselves from whose flying path all sane men have hid.

Past Peekskill, and a glint of sunlight breaks through the murk above the crouching bulk of Bear Mountain across the Hudson. Just here we warp into the tollhouse and pay our bridge-crossing fee.

A turn to the right on the river's far side and at once we cross another bridge, smaller, but equally high-flung, spanning Popolopen Creek. Down, hundreds of feet down, lies this lovely, forest-bordered stream which, only a long stone's throw from its big neighbor, seems as remote as a distant Canadian lumbering waterway.

The Old Mill.

An old, brown, weathered mill house clings to its bank where we look to the left up-stream and I remember that, for a few years, not so long ago, the unmodernity of the spot was intensified by the harboring here of that model of the Half Moon which served New York in the Hudson celebration. Almost I look for an Indian to peer from the forest's edge or expect an early settler, flint-lock on shoulder, to come out of the ancient mill.

The gates at West Point are safely behind us now, thanks to the mentioned name of a Colonel friend whose home is within the grounds.

Clear sunshine at last as we shoot down the stone-paved way under the great gray portal past the cavalry hall that always looks, from the river below, like some old-world feudal pile or a part of the steep rock cliff into which it is built.

We swoop on and up and out across the parade ground, where khaki tents, instead of the surrounding stone barracks, house cadets of the corps at this season.

Now we circle the mounted George Washington at the parade's northern boundary, and the raised arm of the statue, pointing as we come, brings back a story of the old hotel that used to stand behind it and was the momentary home of so many generations of belles and their chaperons at hoptime and graduation. General Washington, the cadets used to say, was commanding a halt just here; "Back," spoke the lifted arm, "Back; the food is terrible."

Past old cannon in rows flanked by camouflaged machine guns set behind stone walls dripping climbing roses, and then on past the tall, quiet gates, with the arms of the United States on their beautiful scroll work, which shut in the peaceful acreage where some of the country's great are asleep. And now we have passed the last sentry at the outgate to the north and suddenly we are clinging to the gorgeous shelf of Storm King Highway. It is a keen thrill to steer this bit of twisting, climbing passage!

There is only time to observe where a crag ahead hangs so near above our craft that if the world should take a heavy breath in its subterranean slumber we'll need more time than the second we have to pass scot-free to a place of open sky again.

And now just a road once more. Old towns coming and going as we sail through. Newburgh, with its unexpected approach to a main street almost as wide as a city block running treeless and straight downhill to the river's edge. But we turn off left before we see its watery end and rush north out of town on a narrower, deeply maple-shadowed way with square, stately old houses lining our channel on either side.

Beside the Road.

Highland, Kingston, Saugerties—all gone down our horizon astern now—all with the fine flavor of old patroon days. Houses built as the Dutch built them, with a long roof over the gable, with walls of stone or old yellow brick brought from far overseas, with dormers and, sometimes, the half-doors of old Holland itself. Tall hollyhocks grow in their dooryards still. Street names like Ten Broek and Van Schaick flash by. Even people—or is that just my imagining—have, here and there, a blondness of hair, a blueness of eye, a stolidness of feature, to match those of this land's beginnings.

At Saugerties we turn at last inland toward the mountains that have never been far away and, almost at once, we are at the Catskills' feet at Palenville. We begin to climb, to wind and wind up the vast clove with its rapid, lovely fall of waters as mysterious still in their green forest-deeps as when Rip Van Winkle heard the bowls of the little people above him, and toiled up to the region of his enchanted rest.

Afternoon now, and too magically perfect with Summer sun and sound for further words of men. The top of the road. The village of the mountain's crest. Another road a mile or so along the mountain's shoulder to the park in whose reservation lie wide estates.

A low stone wall, over it a hedge, behind that a tall army of blue and purpled delphinium and larkspur with a golden glow of California poppies at their feet as July bodyguard. A winding road of reddish earth downgrade to the open, friendly doorway of a quiet brown-shingled house where, from three stories of galleries above us, brown boxes hold orange marigolds that nod down on our reception.

Our engine hushes. Voices and the gay, barking rush of little dogs. Greeting, welcome and a sense of peace and voyaging well done—cruise-end.

A. A. A. IN SURVEY SEEKS HIGHWAY BEAUTIFICATION

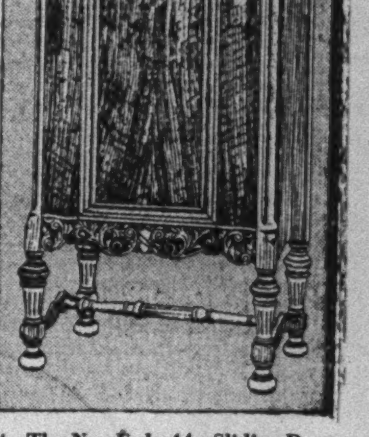
AS the first step in the formulation of a national program of highway beautification, the legislative committee of the American Automobile Association will shortly launch a survey of road conditions throughout the country, it is announced by Thomas P. Henry, president of the organization.

The survey's objective is threefold: First, to determine how highway signs of all kinds may be regulated and controlled so as not to mar the beauty of the road or add to the accident hazard; second, to regulate junk yards and dumping places, and, third, to develop plans for highway beautification in every State.

FADA Radio

Shall your RADIO BE a radio or an exercise machine?

WE crave to know, as we watch owners of other sets bend eye, ear and back to the tuning in of stations — shall a radio be a radio or an exercise machine?



★ The New Fada 44—Sliding Door Lowboy, $188 without tubes

Why peer intently at the eye-straining markings on a dial and fumble a knob until your eye and your ear decide the station is tuned? Wouldn't it be simpler just to reach out from your easy chair, turn the dial until a flash of light proclaims a perfectly tuned station? That is the carefree accomplishment of the Flashograph, Fada's new device for automatically announcing favorite stations in lights by name, precisely tuned. It bids begone the unhandy log book of yesteryear. It abolishes once and for all the grope and fumble method of station finding, as you bend and squint at revolving kilocycles. It is automatic tuning by eye instead of ear.

The Flashograph joins with many other automatic accomplishments in the new Fadas, to make set operation effortless and performance certain. See today these very modern radios, and see why they are the favorites of those who love their ease with their entertainment.

By BENJAMIN GROSBAYNE.

CHOPIN'S "Polonaise Militaire" and "Funeral March" will be broadcast by the Goldman Band from the Mall in Central Park over WJZ tonight at 8:30 o'clock.

The music of Frédéric Chopin (1810-1849), who was half Polish and half French, has both Slavic intensity and sentiment balanced by Gallic clarity and refinement. An understanding of his aims and musical ideas may be best obtained, perhaps, by recalling some contemporary judgments.

"Unequaled limpidity, lightness—elegance and grace; the Ariel of the piano; virile but without abuse of noise; manly energy without roughness; delicacy without affectation; his very soft passages breathed as with soul; his hands seemed made of india-rubber; a tone of vaporous fluidity." Liszt wrote in the Gazette Musicale that Chopin was "an elegiac poet, profound, chaste and dreamy." Another critic rhapsodized about his lacelike and pearly figuration.

The Polonaise is a dance of imposing and majestic triple rhythm, with emphasis on the second beat, often syncopated, and with the second half of the first beat accented. After the election of Henry III of France to the throne of Poland, the Polish nobles and their wives passed before him to this stately measure. From the ceremonial it later became a political dance.

Chopin's Polonaises, eight of which were published in his lifetime, show wrath, sorrow, melancholy, foreboding, chivalry, gallantry, fondness for display, and political and national aspiration. It has been said that the composer visioned all the great heroes of Poland's past walking in spectred form before him as he composed this stirring work.

A Serene, Consoling Melody.

The Funeral March is the third movement from the B flat piano sonata, Op. 35, and was composed in 1838. It is "to be played gloomily and with a self-absorption." The measured, heartrending and agonizedly treading rhythm in the first section gives way to a "serene, consoling melody," after which the first section is again heard. The antithesis between this first part with its dreadful and hopeless despair and the lofty resignation of the contrasting middle part is extreme. Mendelssohn, who hated any display of emotion, said, "I abhor it."

William Henry Reed's "The Lincoln Imp" is included on the program to be broadcast over WOR Tuesday night at 8:30 by the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra under Albert Coates from the Lewisohn Stadium.

Mr. Reed, who studied and taught at the Royal Academy of Music, was born in England in 1876. He became the concertmaster of the London Symphony Orchestra in 1912 and has also conducted.

"The Lincoln Imp" was composed in 1921 and first heard at the festival of the Three Choirs, Hereford, the same year. On the title page of the score is the following explanatory note:

"Concerning the Imp in Lincoln Cathedral, there is a legend that when wandering, bent upon mischief, he chanced to fall in with the Northeast Wind, riding upon it until the cathedral was sighted. Desiring to enter, and bidding the Northeast Wind await his return, the Imp proceeded within. Vaulting the benches, he espied the bell-rope; jangled the bells, strummed upon the organ, tore the vestments to shreds and broke the brazen candlesticks across his knees. Intending to work his crowning mischief upon the altar, he found his way barred by an Angel. Putting out his hand to stroke the wonderful shining hair of the Angel, he was, for his presumption, immediately turned to stone.

Wagner's Comic Opera.

Richard Wagner's overture to "Die Meistersinger" will be part of the program to be played over WOR by the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra under Albert Coates from the Lewisohn Stadium Thursday night at 8:30.

This, the composer's only comic opera, is aimed to show that tradition and progress should be equally balanced in musical creation. The story is about Walther (Wagner himself idealized, something he loved to do), who loves Eva, the daughter of the wealthy goldsmith, Pogner. To win her, he enters the lists to become a Mastersinger, and is helped by Hans Sachs, beating Beckmesser (who stands for the crabby critics, hide-bound by tradition). Shaw does much the same for the spoken drama in his "Fanny's First Play." The high point is Walther's singing of "The Prize Song."

The overture has many of the principal themes of the opera. Two of them symbolize the cooperation of the Mastersingers. Others paint various phases of the lovers' tender feelings. It opens with the Meistersinger motif, a noble march with heavy chords, which is followed by the gentle motif often called "Waking Love," and another Meistersinger theme from the "Banner March," so called because the banner of the guild showed King David strumming his harp. The themes undergo masterly transformation and we hear phrases recalling the "Prize Song" heard later in the opera. An agitated section suggests "impatient ardor," which is played against a countertheme from the singing contest.

The finale presents the "Banner," "Meistersinger" and "Love Confessed" themes simultaneously, one of the greatest examples of contrapuntal writing in all musical literature. The instruments in the orchestra not busy with the main themes play an ornate and majestic background of lace-like tapestry. Some famous critics who heard the first performances were overheard to complain that this passage had no melody, thus showing that their brains could not follow the various themes being heard at the same time.

A Popular Military March.

Franz Schubert's "Marche Militaire" and "Serenade" are to be played by the Goldman Band from New York University over WJZ Saturday night at 8:30.

Schubert wrote three military marches, the most popular one being the first. It is brisk and in two-beat rhythm, but it is hardly what its title leads the reader to expect. It would be an excellent setting to Eugene Field's "Little Boy Blue," for it evokes pictures of little wooden or lead soldiers, children's toys. It is make-believe war, and lyric, for how could Schubert write anything else but beautiful lyrics?

The "Serenade," one of the most famous songs in the world, is the very quintessence of the composer. A dear friend, Anna Fröhlich, one of the few who recognized his genius and did not judge the man or his gifts by his lack of practical and business sense and who understood his poverty, handed him the poem by Grillparzer, whom she had asked to write some verse for one of her pupil's birthdays. Schubert read the words, and leaned over the piano in a revery. His gaze went into the distance and he became lost in thought, deeply moved. Suddenly he said, as if to himself: "How beautiful it is! How beautiful it is!" Three days later the words had been set to the exquisite melody the world knows so well today.

Schubert promised to play the piano accompaniment when it was given under the girl's window, but completely forgot to show up. Perhaps his shoes had no soles, as happened before and after, and forced him to stay indoors. At a concert of his works later, given by friends to raise some money for his rent and very pressing bills, he forgot again to put in an appearance. His friends thought he might be composing other masterpieces, but found him in a café and succeeded in getting him to the concert in time to save the situation.

The composer's judgment in poetry was notoriously questionable, and he lavished his supreme gifts equally on bad, good and indifferent words. He seemed, during the white heat of composition, "not a man, but a force of nature through whom the spirit spoke." This heavenly "Serenade," "The Erl-King" and "Ave Maria," are among the eternally popular of his scores of lyric gems. In the words of Henry T. Finck, we are "not to measure genius with a yardstick," and each of these lyrics is as great and as perfect as a symphony.

DE FOREST LOOKS FAR AHEAD

He Predicts What Will Happen to the Fantastic Dreams of 1930—Short Waves and Television Expected to Work Wonders

IT was Horace Greeley who advised the youth of America some years ago to go West and grow up with the country. Lee De Forest, a Yale man, followed that suggestion and while on the Pacific Coast years ago he made fundamental observations that led to the invention of the audion or vacuum tube. Then he came East.

Now he plans to go across the Rockies again, to the Pacific seaboard, where he will experiment with ultra-short waves, television, talking pictures and other radio developments. Dr. De Forest is one of America's prominent radio men and is now president of the Institute of Radio Engineers.

By DR. LEE DE FOREST.

WHAT will the radio world be like in fifty years, or by the time 1980 rolls around? Will television, talking pictures and broadcasting be as we know them today?

I predict these things will see greater advances, more significant and far-reaching, perhaps, than in any other line of scientific endeavor. In less than fifty years many things looked upon as fantastic or impossible in 1930 will be commonplace.

Power will be brought from the centre of the earth by deep mines or wells. Man will turn the wheels of industry and commerce by tapping the hot, unfathomed centre of this globe. Radio communication may be directly through the earth.

Radio sets will be simplified, using a minimum number of tubes, of a radically more efficient variety than we know today. Many receivers will be of the portable type. Others, with their loud-speakers, will be entirely concealed and operated by remote control. Broadcasters will not sanction advertising on the air. Radio will be improved in many different ways. Television will bring plays and entertainment into the home through space and over miles of wire network.

To Use an Old Tube.

I expect shortly to remove my laboratory to Los Angeles, Cal. That is the logical locality for research in the three subjects which most interest me—radio ultra-short waves, television and talking pictures. The climate makes radio investigations easier; radio vision along the Pacific Coast is possible much of the time when static ruins it in the East. Southern California is the world's centre of talking motion-picture development; moreover, it is a land of beauty and peaceful environment. A scientist will live longer and do much better work under such surroundings than is possible in the East. The entire atmosphere, mental as well as climatic, is to me more invigorating and more inspiring. However, the executive offices and the factory of my company will remain here.

In my radio experiments at the Pacific Coast I expect to produce ultra-short radio waves, probably less than a half meter in length, using a tube now nearly forgotten, but recently revived because of its ability to perform exceptionally on very high frequencies.

It was in 1907 that I developed a vacuum tube having two plates placed around a filament inside a glass envelope, and made a bulb which was extremely promising. The year before I had received a patent for the well-known grid-plate-filament tube which was destined to revolutionize broadcasting and means of reception. This two-plate tube is much more efficient on very short wave lengths.

Would it not be funny if the 1907 two-plate tube, now long past its usefulness as a patent holding, should yet prove to be the best all-around tube for radio telephonic reception and transmission purposes? As a transmitter the two-plate tube has already proved to be one which on ultra-short waves gives a large amount of poyer. Heinz and Kaufman of San Francisco have proved this. I predict it will be found useful as a receiving tube in sets, possibly replacing the screen-grid tube for broadcast reception.

Short-wave radio will help television immensely. That is one reason why I want to explore this interesting field. Television will play a large part in the entertainment of the future. Over wire lines and short waves the images will travel, possibly for hundreds of miles, to lookers-in located in remote parts of the country. In less than fifty years I expect short waves, television and talking pictures to be so developed that the American citizen will see and hear everything of national interest in his own home. Man will have plenty of leisure.

For the Tired Business Man.

When some one wishes to send a message to a friend in Europe the communication will not be sent around the earth by wire, cable or radio, but straight through the earth on a long-wave radio channel. Telephone calls from friends flying in airplanes will be brought directly by radiophone to the persons for whom they are intended.

When the business man leaves his office he will ride home through quiet streets, in noiseless automobiles run by electricity. After dinner he will use the telephone to request connection with a certain centre of entertainment, then sit at home with his family and see and hear the play given on a stage, in New York's Radio City, perhaps hundreds of miles away.

Communication through the earth rather than around its circumference will be by transmitting systems extending down into the earth in deep mines or bores perhaps in the same shaft utilized to draw on the inexhaustible store of heat energy at the core of the earth. This store of energy will have the most profound effect on civilization. I do not expect we will find it necessary to wait fifty years for the beginning of this development. Twenty years ago some of us predicted that before many years fled people at one side of the country might listen to music played at the other side. We were thoroughly laughed at. Some of those scoffers now complain because they cannot get London on the radio.

Because of the great development in industry made possible by the cheap heat and energy from the earth's centre, industry will operate at an accelerated pace. Machines will do the work of men, but many men will be needed to carry on this work. As a matter of course, every home will be equipped with a radio vision set. These receivers will be more compact than those of the present. Because of the cheapness of the earth's power, and hence of electricity, batteries for radio will disappear altogether. All homes will be completely wired for power. Electricity will serve mankind in thousands of new ways.

Television By Wire.

Radio broadcasting will be free of advertising. This will be accomplished either by government control, by programs sent over wire systems so they cannot be tapped or stolen, or by the stations voluntarily eliminating the advertising ballyhoo. Radio reception must be improved both as to quality and extent of the service, or else radio will cease to interest the public.

Television brought into homes over the telephone or electric lighting wires will cost so much per month, just as we now pay for our telephone service. I reiterate, we will eventually go to the theatre by television over a wire line. We will be seated at home in easy chairs with our families and see everything that is worth seeing. Suppose a New Yorker wishes to see and hear an artist performing at San Francisco. All that will be necessary will be to call up the telephone or electric light company and ask to be connected with the network carrying the play. We will see the performance on a six-foot screen in our homes. We will watch the play and hear the players' voices, and the scenes will be reproduced in natural colors.

The theatres and producers of shows will profit by this broadcasting of the production by receiving a share of what subscribers pay for the entertainment service. Thousands of those who see over the wires will want to actually visit the theatres later. There will be no harmful effect to the stage.

Talking motion-picture projectors in the home will also be a regular thing. We will rent films as we now do books from a library and reel them off at our leisure on home projectors. Transmission of motion pictures by radio, I think, will not be so successful. Space transmission will be unnecessary because we will receive the same thing better over wires.

Planes Steered By Radio.

Airplanes will have Diesel motors to drive them, making longer and safer flights possible. People will travel across the ocean in huge planes steered by radio on a fixed course, with a minimum of responsibility placed on the pilot. Radio will be increasingly more important to air travel as air travel is developed and planes will be in constant touch with two hemispheres.

Radio for safeguarding the air lines has taken a spurt on the Pacific Coast. While in California recently I rode from San Francisco to Los Angeles in a thirty-passenger Fokker plane equipped for radio telephony. The transmitting and receiving equipment is mounted in the tail of the ships, and either the pilot or the mate of the airship may speak to the airport by pressing a button. When they want to listen in they release the button. The radio telephone is very satisfactory for ship-to-land station communication or vice versa, and much faster than communication by dots and dashes.

AMERICA TO HEAR KING HAAKON IN FIRST BROADCAST FROM NORWAY

AN ATTEMPT will be made on Wednesday at 5:45 P. M., Eastern Daylight Saving Time, to re-broadcast an address by King Haakon VII of Norway. The microphone will be in the cathedral at Nidaros, Norway. An extensive network associated with WJZ will do the broadcasting in this country.

The five-minute talk will be a part of the celebration of the nine hundredth anniversary of the founding of the cathedral and the establishment of Christianity in the country.

The Cathedral at Nidaros was the first to be erected in the land of the Norsemen. Nine hundred years ago the first of the Christian Kings of Scandinavia was crowned there. Since then every Norwegian monarch has made the journey from Oslo to Nidaros for his coronation.

Over a Devious Route.

The voice of King Haakon will travel a long and devious route before it reaches American receiving sets. Land wires will carry the voice of the monarch to Oslo and thence to Stockholm, Sweden. From there the address will be transmitted by wire and cable to Berlin, where it will be broadcast by a short-wave station of the Reichs Rundfunk Gesellschaft. The experimental receiving station at Riverhead, L. I., will pick up these short-wave signals and convey them to WJZ's headquarters at 711 Fifth Avenue for distribution to the network.

Engineers have made a series of tests to discover the time at which reception in the United States would be clearest. It was found that late in the afternoon would be the best time for the broadcast, King Haakon consented to remain awake most of the night in order that his words would reach the American audience at the hour recommended by the engineers.

C. J. Hambro, president of the Storthing, the Norwegian Congress, will inaugurate the program. After a few introductory remarks he will introduce King Haakon. Erling Krogh, well-known Norwegian tenor, will follow his Majesty. He will sing "Naar Fjordene Blaaner," the Norwegian song to the fjords. Johan Bojer, the author whose stories of Norwegian immigrants in America have won him recognition in this country, will address the American listeners. Following this talk Johanne Dybvad, actress, will be heard in a recitation. Eyvind Alnasa, Norwegian composer, will play a few of the melodies of his country on the great organ which recently was installed in the 900-year-old cathedral.

The program will be concluded with the St. Olav Choir singing Christensen's "Hymn of Greeting," followed by "America" and the Norwegian national anthem.

LISTENING-IN

By ORRIN E. DUNLAP JR.

IT is apparent from letters received during the past few weeks that there are many listeners who enjoy the announcers and feel that it is good judgment on the part of the broadcasters to have the announcers give their names at the end of the program.

"I can speak for two people," said one listener, "who really listen to hear the name of the announcer and then take considerable pleasure in recognizing the voice of an old friend among the men who so ably perform their duties in assisting the performers to entertain us. Listening closely to the announcers is an education in itself. Their wonderful diction, careful pronounciation are educational. The very fact that they must be able to do very well the work required of them before their services are acceptable tends to make what they say and how they say it a matter of interest. Therefore I for one wish to know who each announcer is because of his share in the great project of broadcasting."

A Mother's Radio Rules.

A listener suggests that the broadcasting organizations should send out programs that teach the public "How to Use Radio" or "What Radio is For," since some people seem to be totally unaware of its real purpose.

"I know a mother of one family," said this listener, "who has made it a rule that no one in the household can have breakfast while the Federation of Churches, Cheerio and one other attraction are on the radio every morning. The family must either get up and have breakfast at 6:30 A. M. or nothing until 9 A. M. So much for Mother! She is a real radio fan, and the household in the early hours is governed accordingly. I regret to say that she also turns on the radio at dinner time, which is sometimes more than a bore to every one, and conducive to 'getting on nerves.' This mother and many other people with the same habits, are the ones that I think the broadcasting companies should educate in the use of the radio. We would allow all mothers the privilege of breakfasting at any time, so as not to interfere with 'Cheerio' for example, but there are already too many family quarrels provoked by various things—one should be sorry to learn that a radio had led to the divorce court."

Whoops Sisters on the Air.

A new series of broadcasts, entitled "The Whoops Sisters," will go on the WABC network tomorrow from 6:45 to 7:00 P. M., and every day thereafter except Sundays. The Whoops Sisters arrive on the radio through the drawings and commentaries of their creator, Peter Arno. They belong, in attire, to the Victorian Age, but walk through modern life making comments which are full of comedy and wisdom.

The first episode occurs on the Boston Post Road, where the Whoops Sisters, Abigail and Pansy, encounter certain dilemmas that are representative of Peter Arno's pencil.

Lula Vollmer, American playwright, has written a series of broadcasts for the air. Her dramatized chronicle of the adventures of Clem Betts, Southern mountain boy, will be produced over WEAF, beginning Monday night, July 28. "Moonshine and Honeysuckle" is the title. Clem Betts's discovery of love, related against a background of adventure and warfare in the Southern mountains, will be the substance of the story. Episodes will be heard over the WEAF network each Monday night from 10 to 10:30 o'clock, Eastern Daylight Time.

Louis Mason, Southern actor, who is best known to radio listeners as Louie in the team of Gus and Louie, will play the part of Clem. He will be supported by a cast chosen from actors who have had experience in Southern and mountaineer rôles on the legitimate stage. The cast will include: Ma Betts, played by Anne Sutherland; Pa Betts, played by John Milton; Piney Hyatt, played by Queenie Walker; Annie Bevins, played by Jeannie Begg, and Bones, a mongrel "hound dog."

The voice of Jessica Dragonette, soprano soloist of the concert heard Friday nights at 8 o'clock over WEAF's network, will not be on the air for three weeks. Miss Dragonette sails from New York today for Portland, Me. From there she will motor to Kennebunk Beach, where she will spend her vacation. Miss Dragonette will be back on the air Friday, Aug. 22.

200,000 Requests.

When WABC's network held a "Byrd Comes Home" radio party the Admiral and several of his companions spoke. During the course of the programs a booklet, prepared by the sponsors of the hour and describing the history of the Byrd expedition, was offered free to the young people of the United States and Canada. A lively response was anticipated, but the expectations were greatly exceeded when a flood of 200,000 individual letters and telegrams poured in from every corner of the continent asking for this free booklet, "Highlights of the Bryd Expedition." Many more "quantity" requests were received from schools, colleges and clubs.

Sustaining programs are the broadcasts put on under the auspices of the stations, and are unsponsored by commercial interests. They are the "when-rooms" of the air. A survey of the programs listed for the current week reveals more sustaining programs than have been on the air for some time, which means that there are fewer advertisers on the air now than for several years.

More than 5,000 letters praising WJZ for restoring the Slumber Hour to its old form of music under the direction of Ludwig Laurier, with solos by Milton J. Cross, have been received since the program was restored to its original form.

Del Staigers, cornet soloist and assistant conductor of the Goldman Band, has written a new musical number designed primarily for a cornet with band accompaniment. The piece has not been named. Mr. Staigers has decided to have the public name it. The selection will be played several times between now and the end of the season and any one is privileged to suggest a name. All communications must be received before Aug. 11 in order that the judges may announce the winner at the closing concert of the season. The winner will receive a silver loving cup.

"Everything I read upholding the better class programs speaks loudly to me," reports a listener. "If I cannot find something besides jazz on the air, the radio is silent until such time as more programs are available. On many days Cheerio is our last program in the morning. Jazz is disagreeable."

Swiss Want New Word.

The Swiss do not like the American word "broadcasting" and are seeking a substitute, according to Dr. S. Guggenheim, a member of the board of directors of Radio-Genossenschaft, the Swiss broadcasting company.

"Shortly before I left Switzerland to come to America," said Dr. Guggenheim, who recently visited this country to study our radio methods and equipment, "I met with the other members of our board to seek a word that would more properly and comprehensively interpret the idea of radio transmission than the English term 'broadcast.' I finally suggested that a contest be run, through the medium of a magazine published by the company, to determine the best word to replace 'broadcasting.' As an incentive to contestants, I offered an Atwater Kent radio receiver as first prize. The board voted unanimously to accept my plan and we started things going. Competition for the coveted prize is keen and the contest has stirred up a great amount of interest. Several thousand entrants had already sent in their suggestions before I sailed for America."

LIFE WAY DOWN EAST WINS RADIO APPLAUSE

Seth Parker, Uncle Abe and Rudy Vallee Have Put The Pine Tree State on the Broadcast Map

By FLORENCE V. KAISER.

MAINE, the Pine Tree State, has won first place on the map of radio broadcasting because of the characters that have departed from the wooded region to actuate the microphone in a way that has won the applause of thousands of listeners.

Skowhegan, a typical Maine town, the capital of Somerset County, is situated in the centre of the State, thirty miles north of Augusta. The population is about 5,000. Uncle Abe and David have put Skowhegan on the map.

Seth Parker has acquainted the nation with Jonesport, with its population of about 3,000. Jonesport is in Washington County on the Atlantic Ocean, fourteen miles south of Machias, which is sixty miles east of Bangor. It is listed in the Gazetteer as a town that manufactures bricks, while Skowhegan is credited with "a fine court house, public library, paper and pulp mills, plants that manufacture oilcloth, leather and scythes."

A Crooner from Westbrook.

Rudy Vallee, with his saxophone, crooned the fame of Westbrook, Me., from coast to coast. This town is in Cumberland County, five miles west of Portland. The population of about 10,000 turned out a week ago to welcome Rudy home on vacation from his ethereal campaign.

Phillips Lord, who plays the rôle of Seth on each Sabbath night in the radio sketch, "Sunday Evening at Seth Parker's," also has the part of Uncle Abe, while Arthur Allen is Uncle David, in the Uncle Abe and David sketch. They are famous for their portrayals of New England rural characters.

Skowhegan is located on a railroad. Its postoffice is open all year, which indicates a non-migratory citizenry. Nevertheless, many tourists must pass through and buy equipment there. How else would one account for the prosperous condition of "Uncle Abe and David," who run Everybody's Equippery, allowing them to spend a vacation and a "hull heap o' money" in New York?

Abe and David Arrive Quickly.

The adventures of the two old New Englanders along Broadway and Park Avenue have come to a quick popularity, which threatens to rival that of two of the greatest character actors radio has produced thus far, Amos 'n' Andy, whom they immediately precede on the air. The blackface duo are on WJZ's network at 7 P. M., while Abe and David travel over WEAF at 6:45 P. M., daily except Sunday.

Uncle Abe's and David's ideas about the city and their comparison of the gay and complicated life there with the old mode of living down East are the nuclei of the current presentations of the new daily air feature. Phillips Lord has been so much discussed as Seth Parker that there is very little left to write about Uncle Abe. He is but 28 years old. After being graduated from Bowdoin College in 1925 he drifted into office work in New York, but was not satisfied.

Seth Parker is on the air Sunday nights. Seth is the leader of the cottage prayer meetings which were a feature of the rural community thirty to forty years ago. The radio audience in tune with WJZ and affiliated stations at 10:45 P. M. on the Sabbath hear Seth and his neighbors at Jonesport.

During his off-hours Lord attempted writing short stories for the magazines, with the idea of giving a true portrayal of the "simple, kindly, quiet, confident lives that are in eternal contrast with the grotesque grasping and the feverish frustration that make up 'life' for so many enlightened sophisticates." The magazines did not seem to take kindly to Lord's stories, judging from the frequency with which he removed returned manuscripts from his mail box. He then hit upon the idea of broadcasting, where his Yankee speech would stand him in good stead.

Station WTIC, in Hartford, consented to try out the sketches, and shortly thereafter Seth Parker came into being. After more than a year of success in this rôle Lord is adding to his laurels by the even more popular portrayal of Uncle Abe.

A Native of Gowanda.

Arthur Allen, who is stepping into fame along with Lord, is an old-timer in the broadcast studios. Gerald Stopp, a radio production man, brought him to the microphone 'way back in the old days. He had a part he thought Allen could play, so he telephoned him. Allen protested. Stopp won the argument, however, and a few days later a new radio character man had made his appearance. Now, Allen is recognized as one of the outstanding male character actors in broadcasting.

Allen is not a native of Maine, but was born in Gowanda, N. Y., thirty-eight years ago. He went to high school in his home town and to college in Oberlin, Ohio. Then he studied at a conservatory of music and held down a job as a church organist for several years.

Along about 1913 Allen entered what he terms the "greatest school for an actor ever devised"—a stock company—where he remained for five years. From stock he went into road companies and later into Broadway productions. Radio followed.

Allen's mother, who is 81 years old, is said never to have heard him broadcast. When he wrote her he was going into radio broadcasting, she replied, "Don't you do it. You haven't got the voice." He is married and lives in Hempstead, L. I.

There is no doubt among the radio audience that Maine is coming in for a fair share of broadcast glory with two such hard-working boosters as Phillips Lord and Rudy Vallee constantly before the microphones, the latter having nationally popularized the "Maine Stein Song."

"THE PERFECT SONG" TELLS LISTENERS THAT AMOS 'N' ANDY ARE COMING

EVERY night, except on the Sabbath, at 7 o'clock the haunting strains of a melody vibrate the air around many loud-speakers, calling a busy world to pause and listen to the antics of Amos 'n' Andy. The theme song which some have called "America's weakness," is not nameless, however. Yet, how many know its real name and who wrote the music? When this melody is heard dinners are momentarily forgotten in expectation of the episode or predicament in which "the boys" will be found.

It has been estimated that not one-quarter of 1 per cent of the listeners in America, although they faithfully follow the black face duo day by day, know that the selection which opens and closes the broadcast was written by Joseph Carl Briel, and is called "The Perfect Song." Those who have good memories for music and events, however, will remember that it was played originally as part of the musical score accompanying the motion picture, "The Birth of a Nation."

Among those who lean expectantly toward their loud-speakers nightly to catch the first note of the music, then settle back in an easy chair anticipating what is to follow, are some who might like to know what group of musicians play "The Perfect Song." Some have observed that it probably is reproduced from a phonograph record because each broadcast sounds the same, with precisely the same time and tonal color. This is a tribute to the trio of musicians, who present the music nightly from the studio of WMAQ, Chicago. They are Joseph Gallicchio, violinist and director; Franz Pfau, pianist, and Johan Lingemann, 'cellist. Mr. Gallicchio arranged the Briel composition for broadcasting. Besides being the leader for the Amos 'n' Andy music he is the WMAQ orchestra director. His violin, made more than 200 years ago by the noted builder, Joseph Gagliano, has exceptional tonal qualities.

'Cellist From Holland.

Johan Lingemann, the 'cellist, was born in Amsterdam, Holland, where in his early life he studied music with the teacher and musician Gerard Hekking. His first attempts were with the flute, but love for the 'cello caused him to forsake the reed instrument for the bow. He has appeared with many organizations, including the Emil Saurett String Quartet of London, and the Chicago String Quartet.

Franz Pfau, the third member of the trio, who was born in Vienna, began his musical training with the violin. He later changed to the piano and became widely recognized as a gifted performer on that instrument. He has given recitals throughout Europe and America.

"The Perfect Song" was not taken haphazardly to be the theme song of the Amos 'n' Andy presentations. Much time and discussion was devoted to the choice. Before being finally selected, nineteen other musical composition of classical, semi-classical and popular type were considered.

RADIO GOES FORWARD IN THE BRITISH ISLES

Broadcasting Company's Report Called Vindication of Semi-State Control of the Ether

By L. M. GANDER.

THE British system of semi-State control of radio is, so far as progress is concerned, triumphantly vindicated in the third annual report of the British Broadcasting Corporation. Figures are published which show that broadcasting, now well past the experimental period and the stage of novelty, is continuing its forward march unchecked.

There is an answer in this document to the gloomy prophets who foreshadowed the atrophy of the wireless service in Britain when private enterprise gave way to the new order, and who predicted the speedy decline and fall of a well-established industry.

The statistics show that the number of licenses issued at the end of December, 1928, was 2,628,392. At the end of 1929 the number had risen to the gigantic new total of 2,956,736. Since then the steady climb has continued and the total now stands at 3,144,626.

12,500,000 Listeners.

At the modest estimate of four listeners to every receiving set, the potential audience in Britain is 12,500,000. America may have more motor cars and more telephones, but it is the proud belief of the chiefs of Britain's radio service that we have more auditors in proportion to the population.

Evidently the public is more or less satisfied. Program critics may, and probably will, go on raving and grousing at the organ recitals and the talks (of which there are a large number), at the broadcasting of the stock prices and similar entertaining items; the Broadcasting Company, on the other hand, can always point complacently to the license figures. And at present, certainly, they have a very effective answer.

Reason For Astonishment.

One is now cautious of talking about saturation point in the number of licenses. Such talk has been going on at intervals for years. Then the next lot of figures has come along and shown another increase. There is reason for astonishment at this continual expansion. Already every house seems to have the wireless installed as they have gas, water and electricity.

There is little enthusiasm discernible among the owners of radio sets for the pastime of listening. It is more of a habit than anything else, and is regarded as a necessity—not a luxury or an exciting diversion. In other words, radio is more firmly established in Britain than anybody dreamed could be possible when Captain P. P. Eckersley founded his little experimental station at Writtle, Essex, a year or two after the war. From there (so I am informed) it was his custom to send out time signals sounded on empty beer bottles!

Progress, which is attributable to the reorganization of the service, now proceeding, into fewer high-powered stations, is reflected in a number of ways. For instance, in 1929 there were 881 S O S messages broadcast. These are sent out as a last resort, and, generally speaking, are requests for lost relatives to attend the bedsides of dying people. The chances of success seem very remote. If there is any other conceivable way of getting in touch with the persons wanted, an S O S will not be broadcast. Yet of this number, 367 (41.6 per cent) were successful.

Appeals for charity, as far as is known, realized £64,000 during the year—and an appeal (of which there were about forty-eight) only lasts five minutes.

Though no exact figures are available, it is believed that 5,000 schools listened to the special lectures for their benefit. It is a fact that 2,356 followed the courses regularly and kept in touch with the Broadcasting Corporation.

Money for the Coffers.

But there is, of course, another side to the picture. In this heavily taxed country it is too much to expect that all the revenue from broadcasting licenses (which cost 10s. each per annum) shall go to the development of the broadcasting service. Hence we find that the Broadcasting Company's share of the spoils does not increase proportionately with the rise in the number of licenses. Money which should be devoted to the development and improvement of the radio service is diverted into the coffers of the treasury. The actual net license income available bore the proportion to gross license income of 63.3 per cent in 1927, 62.9 per cent in 1928 and 57.7 per cent in 1929.

The sums available were £754,609 in 1927, £822,206 in 1928 and £847,605 in 1929.

These figures are reached after the postoffice has taken 12½ per cent for collection and the treasury a certain surplus which, under the terms of the charter, has increased proportionately as the number of licenses has advanced. Thus in 1929 the approximate gross revenue from licenses was £1,470,000. The postoffice claimed £183,750, the treasury £341,949. Income tax accounted for another £60,000 and depreciation and reserve for £36,696.

The only gratifying feature of the financial situation from the broadcasting point of view is that people pay without much trouble. Considering the difficulty in detecting "piracy"—especially if it were widely prevalent—the figures are a wonderful reflection of the law-abiding character of the British people.

In India, for example, they attempted a similar scheme of listening licenses; but piracy was so rampant that the plan broke down utterly.

Actually, however, for each new additional ten-shilling license which is taken out, it is estimated that the British Broadcasting Corporation gets about five shillings.

WOR TO BROADCAST RECORDS THIS WEEK

Station WOR will begin a series of electrically recorded broadcasts tomorrow from 8:15 to 8:30 A. M., and from 8:45 to 9 A. M. The same schedule will be followed on Wednesday and Thursday. On Tuesday and Friday the recorded programs will be on the air from 8:25 to 8:30 A. M. and from 8:45 to 9 A. M.

"There will be no let-down in the standard of WOR's programs," said a representative of the station. "It will be the duty of the station's auditions board to pass on every transcription, the same as it does on artists appearing in person. We feel confident that any recorded programs which get that body's stamp of merit will meet with the approval of every listener who hears them."

A new program of dramatized detective stories will begin on Thursday, at 9:30 P. M., over WABC's network. "The Serpent Stings" is the title of the mystery thriller scheduled to open these broadcasts.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

New Battery-Operated Tubes Found Unsatisfactory For Existing Superheterodyne Sets

QUESTION—I was much interested in the first question in the Questions and Answers in today's radio section. I, in conjunction with many others, still use Radiola No. 28, and would be very interested to hear whether the tubes No. 230 and 231, which you mention therein, have been brought out for use in that set without any change either in "A" or "B" hook-up, as you know it is a highly complicated mechanism and would be impossible to change the harness to the battery connections in any way. I feel pretty sure that the R. C. A. Company must have had this question in mind and would greatly appreciate an answer from you in next week's radio section if it is reasonably possible.—H. A. M. ANSWER—Recent tests made by R. C. A. engineers have revealed that the new 2-volt filament tubes, 230, 231 and 232, will not work in the Radiola 25, 26, 28, or any battery-operated superheterodyne, because they cause the sets to oscillate violently. It was previously thought these tubes would operate satisfactorily in such receivers. The 2-volt tubes will operate well in the Radiola 20, a tuned radio-frequency set, with minor adjustments.

QUESTION—I am going to Germany and plan to take an American broadcast receiver of the portable type along. Is there a duty on such sets? (2) What are the conditions in Holland in case I go there, too?—N. J. ANSWER—Visitors in Germany are required to obtain a license for a limited period at any postoffice. If that is done duty is free. (2) Sets used by visitors for a short stay are duty free. If the length of the visit is doubtful the visitor must deposit 8 per cent of the set's value, which is refunded when leaving the country.

QUESTION—Where can I get a list of broadcasting stations, with their respective wavelengths?—J. H. ANSWER—Write to the Superintendent of Documents, Government Printing Office, Washington, D. C. The latest list is of June 2, 1930.

QUESTION—Our Radiola 17 is situated in the central building of a group of five cottages separated from each other from distances ranging from 125 to 350 feet. The aerial is 100 feet long. As there are some heavy thunderstorms here and leads from the set go through woods, I would like to know how I can safeguard the cottages and the radio from lightning. There is heavy static on the set when rain threatens, and as there are about sixty pair of earphones in parallel, the static drowns out the station. If I ground the leads would that decrease the static? (2) Would I have to ground both wires or one from the leads? (3) WABC comes in all right until 9 P. M. and after that always fades for a few minutes and then comes in full power for the same length of time. This only happens in the case of WABC. Could you give me the name of some wholesale radio supply company dealing in earphones? (5) Would it be possible for me to get from a wholesaler some caps for Brandes phones?—L. R. ANSWER—A lightning arrester should be installed at the point where the lead-in enters the building. (2) Follow the installation instructions furnished with the arrester. (3) The symptom indicates that another set or antenna near by is blanketing your set. If another antenna is near run the wires at right angles to each other. (4) Graybar Electric Company. (5) They are no doubt standard caps which a local dealer can arrange to get for you.

QUESTION—I have a nine-tube superheterodyne, direct-current type, using four screen-grid tubes. This set is tuned with .00015 and .0005 condensers and has plug-in coils. I recently borrowed a set of short-wave plug-in coils and tuned in W3XAL on 49.18 meters with fairly good volume. I also had W9XF at Chicago and W8XK at Pittsburgh, but with very little volume. This was with the original oscillator coil in the set. At certain places the strong stations on the broadcast band would come in with this short-wave coil faintly. I was not able to tune in anything below 49 meters, not even code, nor anything above 50 meters. Can you explain why? (2) Do you think this set will work with proper coils? The manufacturer of the set does not have them and advises the use of a short-wave converter; however, I have tried the converter with only fair success and would much prefer to use the set with the proper plug-in coils if it is possible to do so, and I believe that it is possible in view of my experience with the 49-meter wave lengths—O. M. H. ANSWER—Without the proper coils, correctly placed in the detachable coil bases, the set will not work except haphazardly, as you have found. When the stations mentioned were intercepted it probably was through a harmonic of the set's oscillator, heterodyning with the incoming wave. Ask the set's maker to refer you to a company which can supply the proper coils. (2) Yes, the oscillator coil will have to be changed along with the other coils.

SELECTED WORDS.

The roar of airplane motors imposes a considerable handicap upon airmen who attempt to carry on conversation in the air via radio. For this reason experiments have been made by Air Corps officers at Rockwell Field, Coronado, Cal., on certain words which can be heard to the best advantage. In all, 500 words were selected for the first elimination list, and this number was subsequently cut to an even 100. Consonants especially are hard to hear, except where the vowels in the words predominate.

A misunderstanding in messages could cause damage, and so the officers have spent more time than can be imagined in selecting their list of words, the favorites being "right"; "left"; "stop"; "okey"; "good" and "hit," all of which more or less refer to target practice. In the word "right," for example, the "r" and the "t" are scarcely heard, but only the vowel "i" and in "good" it is the "oo" and so on.

RADIO TRADE COMMENT

Improved Type of Airplane Receiving Set Is Introduced Using Screen-Grid Tubes

AN improved type of aircraft radio receiver has been introduced by the Stromberg-Carlson Telephone Company, Rochester, N. Y., which will manufacture it following specifications developed by Aircraft Radio Corporation, Boonton, N. J., pioneers in airplane radio receiving apparatus. The outstanding feature of the many interesting ones found in the receiver is that it is universal as to frequency band.

A frequency range of from 250 to 15,000 kilocycles is covered by the set, through the use of a removable coil assembly. The receiver proper measures 15 by 7½ by 6½ inches. The weight with tubes and shock mounting is eighteen pounds. The receiver may be operated from dynamotor or dry battery plate supply; filaments of the tubes are heated from the twelve-volt airplane battery. Four screen-grid 224 type heater tubes and one type 227 heater tube are employed.

In the circuit design care has been taken to provide the best possible signal to noise ratio, so that the receiver is particularly quiet in operation. Four tuned circuits insure adequate selectivity for the increasing congestion of aircraft radio channels in the United States. Extreme sensitivity is provided so that the set is particularly suitable for use with small "built-on" antennas. It will operate satisfactorily with an antenna exposure as small as two feet above the fuselage.

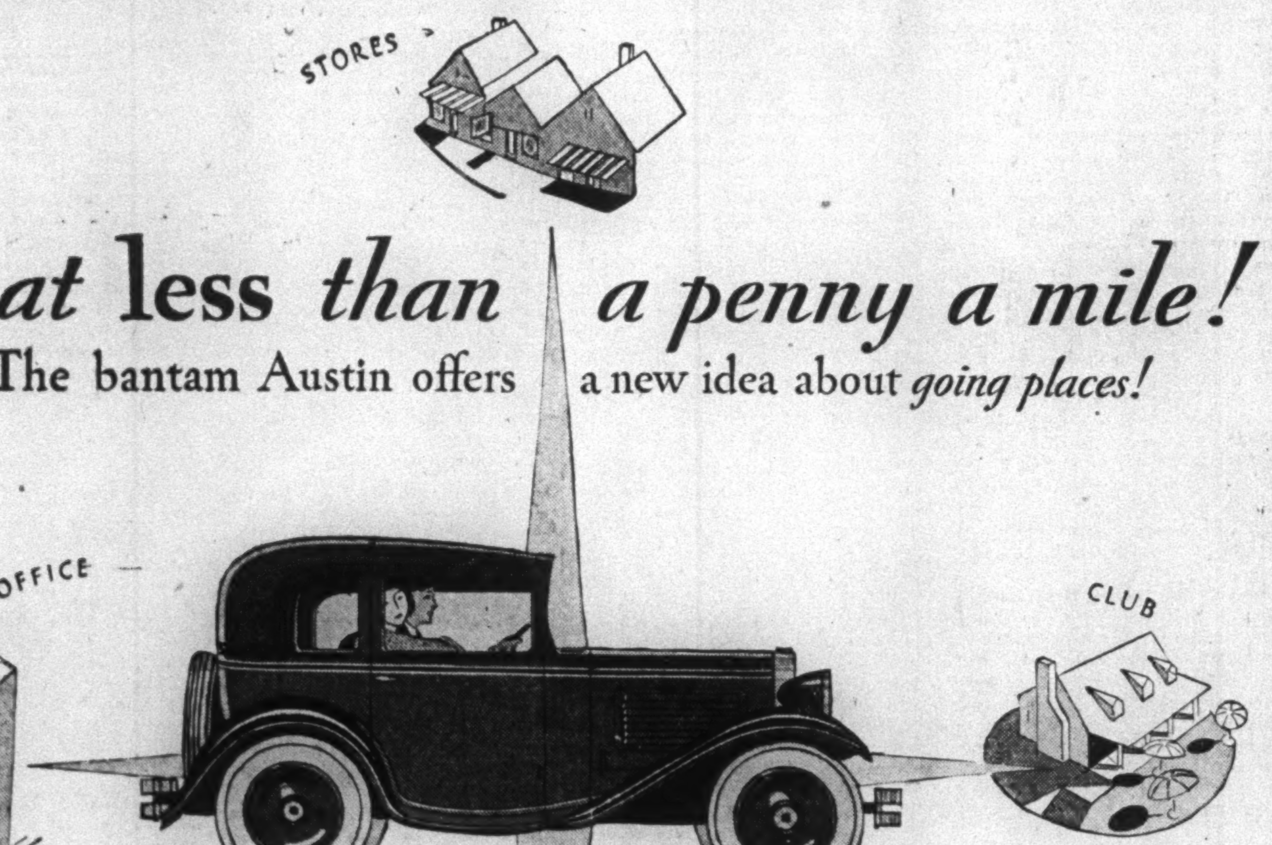
The Radio Corporation of America has announced the appointment of the Radio Distributing Corporation, with headquarters at Newark, N. J., as sole distributers of Radiolas in eleven Pennsylvania counties, including the Scranton and Wilkes-Barre territory and the southern half of Susquehanna County. This is in addition to the thirteen northern counties of New Jersey and Staten Island, which Radio Distributing Corporation now serves. The new territory includes a population of more than a million.

Another link has been added to the New England network, headed by WNAC, with the addition of Station WORC, at Worcester. In addition to taking many of the commercial programs of WNAC, this station will also handle the programs of the Columbia network until other arrangements are made. WORC has an application pending for the use of more power. It now uses 100 watts.

NEW RADIO CALLS FOR COAST GUARD

New radio calls have been placed in effect at all shore stations of the United States Coast Guard and will become effective on all ship stations of the service on Sept. 30. The block assigned to Coast Guard vessels is NRAA to NRZZ, to Radio Stations NOA to NOZ.

In assigning the call letters to radio traffic stations, the third letter follows the same system used in assigning general radio calls to division commanders and other command units in each division. The latest first-class cutters will have the letters NRU, the fourth letter being selected arbitrarily, but usually indicating the first letter of the name of the vessel.



---- at less than a penny a mile!

The bantam Austin offers a new idea about going places!

CONSIDER this new idea of transportation without tonnage, beauty without bulk, mileage with minimum expense... see what it offers you.

First of all . . . economy. Here is the bantam Austin waiting to take you wherever you wish for a mere ¾ of a cent a mile for gas, oil and tires. It's a car that does fifty miles an hour on the straightaway yet which stretches a gallon of gasoline over forty miles of road as well.

It is one member of the family that seldom needs new shoes. Twenty to forty thousand miles on a set of tires is its usual performance.

Yet the bantam Austin vies in smartness with cars of far more impressive list prices, offers as much of a thrill in its way as the high powered giants, and gives you a sense of perfect control and easy handling that only another Austin can match. Yet it lists for but $445 f.o.b. factory.

As the garage-mate of your larger car, the Austin will pay for itself by sparing the big car the many one and two passenger trips that are so costly in fuel and depreciation.

Come see it!

Bring your prejudices with you!

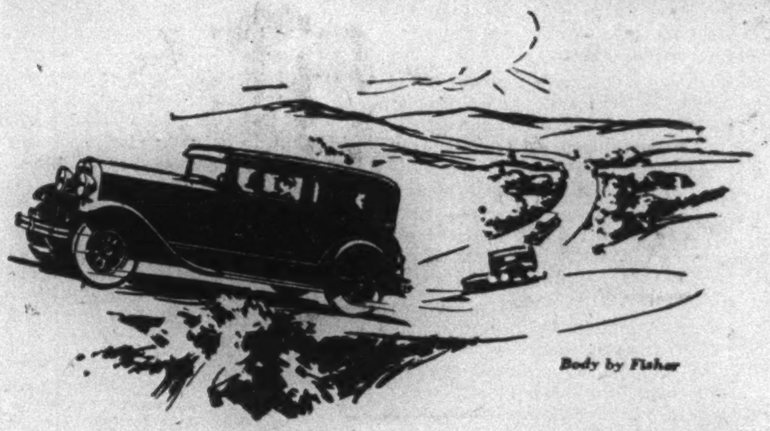
A GREAT CAR ON THE ROAD



Body by Fisher

Vacation time . . . the call of the open road . . . emphasize more forcefully than ever that Oldsmobile is a great car on the road.

It has speed that makes miles a matter of minutes. It has pick-up to flash past slower-moving cars. It has a tremendous power reserve for hills and hard pulling.

Such alert all-round performance in itself makes Oldsmobile a brilliant car to drive. But this fine car of low price offers infinitely more.

Its big, powerful engine is so smooth that there is no noticeable vibration, even at high speeds. Its performance is so flexible that it responds instantly to every call you make upon it. Its low center of gravity and balanced weight give it roadability that seems almost uncanny. It is so easy to handle—in steering, in gear-shifting, in braking—that you can drive all day long without fatigue. And it is so comfortable, with its wide, deep-cushioned seats and four hydraulic shock absorbers, that riding is always restful, no matter where you drive.

We feel certain Oldsmobile performance will appeal to you. Come in and let us show you, by actual tests, what a splendid car it is to drive, in traffic or on the road.

Tilden vs. Cochet.
Lott vs. Borotra.

By LANSING WARREN.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES

AUTEUIL, France, July 26.—Jacques (Toto) Brugnon gained glorious recognition as an international doubles player today when President Doumergue of the French Republic leaned down from his reserved box in the Roland Garros Stadium and congratulated him on France's victory over the United States in the doubles of the Davis Cup while a crowd of 10,000, delirious with joy, roared approval.

Brugnon, as the partner of Henri Cochet, had just decisively routed the heavily favored Americans, Wilmer Allison and John Van Ryn, Wimbledon champions, who last year at this same place administered as severe defeat to Cochet, then paired with Jean Borotra.

The four-set triumph by 6—3, 7—5, 1—6, 6—2 sent France into the lead, two matches to one, in the challenge round for the famous tennis trophy and left the American players only a fighting chance by a sweep of two singles matches tomorrow. To do it George Lott must conquer Borotra and William T. Tilden must face the discouraging requirement of beating Cochet, who, with each appearance rapidly approaches the form by which he became the unquestioned king of the racquet world.

Tilden in Good Form.

This can be done, for Tilden now is more like the old Tilden who overtopped all competitors than he has been for many years. Cochet, even with his marvelous tennis today, scored errors in critical moments, and if he should have an off day tomorrow, as he sometimes has been known to have, it is possible that he will fall before the wily attack of Tilden.

Borotra will have the benefit of a full day's rest before his encounter with Lott, but his style against Tilden yesterday showed that Lott, playing as steady a game as he did against Cochet, has some hope for victory.

The Americans in their doubles match played with poor judgment in concentrating their attack upon Brugnon. Not only did Brugnon withstand this onslaught in admirable style but as a result Cochet, who might have been worn down for his match with Tilden tomorrow by being forced to his uttermost, walked from the court apparently as fresh as at the start and in better trim than ever after playing two successive days in a Davis Cup challenge—the greatest strain that can be put upon tennis play.

By battering Cochet, Allison and Van Ryn would also have lost, but as it happened they threw the match away to no purpose.

Great Interest in Match.

The contest was turned by the French into the season's greatest sporting spectacle comparable in every way to the equestrian Grand Prix at Longchamps. It was played in the presence of President Doumergue, accompanied by the presidents of the Chamber and Senate, members of the Cabinet and other officials, while Ambassador Edge with Mrs. Edge sat on the opposite side of the stadium. The reserved boxes were occupied by leading personalities of the diplomatic corps and persons prominent in international society.

The stands were packed to capacity and had an opportunity of cheering René Lacoste, popular French tennis star, who entered the stadium with his pretty bride and the French women's golf champion, who was formerly Mlle. Simone Thion de La Chaume.

The Davis Cup itself stood in state upon a blue and gold draped dais placed at the end of the court in front of the Presidential box just before the play opened.

The complete Davis Cup teams, including for the United States Tilden, Lott, Allison and Van Ryn, and for France Cochet, Borotra, Burgnon and Christian Boussus, entered the stadium simultaneously with the French President, who descended to the court in front of the Davis Cup and warmly shook hands with each player.

Honor for Borotra.

Borotra, personally admired by the French fans, was cheered long because of an announcement today that he had been awarded the rank of Chevalier in the Legion of Honor, not as a sporting decoration, but for his services to France in representing her good name in foreign countries.

Then the doubles match was called and play began with a general expectation of a rapid American victory. The first three games went to the French team, however, and the Americans were nervous and not working together. Van Ryn netted several easy ones and Cochet made his rivals run into each other plac-

Californian Scores Brilliant Victory, 2-6, 6-3, 6-4, 5-7, 12-10, in Metropolitan Play.

HUNTER OTHER FINALIST

Conquers Burns, 6-4, 6-3, 6-4, in Turf Court Semi-Finals at Crescent A. C.

By ALLISON DANZIG.

An 18-year-old Californian, with one of the most soundly developed all-round games of any player that the Pacific Coast has sent East in years, proved his right to a classification among the leading young tennis hopefuls of the country yesterday when he defeated Frank Shields in the metropolitan turf court championships.

With the largest gallery of the week looking on from the stands of the Crescent Athletic Club in Bay Ridge, Brooklyn, Ellsworth Vines, towering Pasadena youth, came from behind, after losing the first set, to snatch victory from the twelfth ranking player of the country in a 22-game fifth set and reach the final round. The score was 2—6, 6—3, 6—4, 5—7, 12—10.

In the other semi-final Francis T. Hunter of New Rochelle, using his heavy artillery with devastating effect, stopped the march of E. W. Burns of the home club at 6—4, 6—3, 6—4.

The final will be held this afternoon at 2:30 and will be followed by the concluding round of the New York sectional doubles.

Vines Repeats 1929 Victory.

The victory of Vines was the second that he has gained over Shields. Last year, in the Michigan State championship, the Californian was returned the winner in a match for the best of three sets.

That meeting was staged on clay and that the Pasadena junior, in his first season of play on grass, should have beaten a player of the reputation, the experience and the ideal stroke equipment and build of the New Yorker, distinctly stamps him as one of the best prospects California has produced since the arrival of William Johnston.

The game that beat Shields was a game that is patterned closely after his own, and the youth behind the game is a physical prototype of the 19-year-old New Yorker. Like Shields, Vines comes to the court with a splendid physical endowment. Standing well over six feet in height, he has the ranginess, the reach and the mobility of a Tilden, and his shrewdness and coolness under fire, his refusal to be stampeded or hurried at any juncture, would have done justice to Tilden, much less a youngster of eighteen years.

As unusual as is the collectedness and generalship of this stripling from the coast, even more to be commented on is his stroke equipment, with reference to his grips. Unlike the great majority of players from the asphalt and concrete courts of California, he uses the "Eastern" grip on both his forehand and backhand, and this explains his adaptability to turf on his first visit to the East.

Shields Meets Master.

But his grips alone do not explain the uniform excellence of his game. Shields has generally been held up as an example of the perfect player, with strength in every department and no visible weakness in his stroke production. But yesterday he met a player to whose stunning cross-court forehand his own was forced

ISTALENA OUTSAILS LARCHMONT RIVALS

241 BOATS IN 6TH REGATTA

Special to The New York Times.

LARCHMONT, N. Y., July 26.—The Larchmont Yacht Club's thirty-second annual race week came to a close today with 241 boats sailing in the sixth and final regatta. A moderate northwest breeze started the boats across the line and increased toward the middle of the afternoon. Again courses were shortened, bringing the boats home at an early hour.

George M. Pynchon sailed his Istalena to victory about four minutes ahead of C. B. Wiman's Simba in Class M to win the Commodore Maxwell trophy.

Priscilla III Prize Winner.

Also Priscilla III, Johnston de Forest's eight-meter open-class boat; Roulette III, Carreau and Moeller's eight-meter one-design boat; Briggs Cunningham's six-meter Lucie; Flash, Schmeltzer's Atlantic class boat, with Miss Lorna Whittelsey at the helm, and John Carlisle's Sound junior class boat Sabalo.

The larger boats today took thirteen and nine-mile courses, starting at the committee boat off the club harbor. The first leg was to Great Captain's Island for the M's and to Parsonage Point for the other large boats. This gave the boats a windward beat.

From these points the boats worked across the Sound on a reach. The final leg for most of the classes brought them back from Long Island on a broad reach.

GIANTS ROUT BRAME AND UPSET PIRATES

25,000 See McGrawmen Launch Seven-Run Attack in Fifth and Win, 10-4.

By JOHN DREBINGER.

The Pirates to all intents and purposes appeared to be scientifically outpointing the Giants at the Polo Grounds yesterday when the young men of John McGraw, feeling decidedly exasperated, brought a haymaker up from the floor.

In fact, they brought up several, and by concentrating these into one sweeping, devastating attack in the fifth round, in which they scored seven runs, three of these riding home on the crest of a magnificent circuit clout by Freddy Lindstrom, rolled back the Buccaneers for the third successive day.

The score was 10 to 4 and sent a gathering of 25,000 on its way secure in the belief that all is well that ends with the Giants on top.

Brame a Puzzle at First.

But for quite a spell it looked as though no such decision ever would be reached, as Ervin Brame held the McGraw men to one hit, a two-bagger by Bill Terry in the first four innings, while the Pirates rushed the chubby Fitzsimmons for three hits and two runs in the opening round, and to this added another tally in the third when George Grantham crashed a homer into the upper left tier.

This state of affairs had the crowd fretting and McGraw fuming, when seemingly from nowhere at all the Giant storm broke in all its fury. Mel Ott gently opened the fifth with a single, which, however, led the Pirates to believe that nothing of a serious nature would follow, as Hogan struck out and Marshall contribuated a sacrifice fly that merely advanced Ott a base.

But then came an attack that almost set a record and certainly made the Pirates feel decidedly ill, as seven consecutive hits came sailing off the Giant bats. Roettger singled and Fitzsimmons, still nettled over the treatment he had received in the early rounds, smashed a double to left. Critz and Leach followed with singles.

Lindstrom Hits Into Stands.

ROBINS BEAT REDS WITH LONG DRIVES

Wright Is Leading Factor, Batting In Three Runs to Aid in 8-5 Victory.

By ROSCOE McGOWEN.

Keeping even with the pace set by the other pennant contenders, the Cubs and the Giants, the Robins yesterday gained an 8-5 victory over the Reds at Ebbets Field, to take the series with the Rhinelanders, three games to none, and hung tightly to their half-game lead over the Chicago champions.

The Howleymen left immediately after the game for home, to open a series with the Cubs, while the Robins will have a chance to strengthen their position at the expense of the Phillies in a double-header today.

Considerable extra-base slugging by Wright, Frederick, Bissonette, Bressler, Gilbert and Lopez gave Babe Phelps his ninth victory of the season and retired Jake May, chubby Red southpaw, as early as the end of the sixth.

Phelps himself was removed from the game, apparently against his will, after the Reds had scored two runs in the seventh, and Freddie Heimach, who relieved him, was so ineffective that he, too, was yanked and Dazzy Vance was sent in to pitch the last two frames.

Sends Three Across Plate.

Captain Glenn Wright starred in the business of batting in runs, sending three Robins across the plate with a home run and a single. His homer, made in the fourth off May, was the sixth he has poled at home since the Western clubs' invasion, which began with the first Pirate game on July 14.

Bissonette, with a single and triple, drove in two tallies, and Gilbert, with a double and single, accounted for two more. The eighth run was a gift from Silas Johnson, Red relief pitcher, who wild-pitched Lopez home in the eighth, following the Robin catcher's triple.

The Robins soared away to a lead in the first inning on the wings of Frederick's opening triple and Bissonette's single, but the Reds tied the score in the fourth on consecutive singles by Meusel, Stripp and Cuccinello.

In the lower half of that frame, however, Wright poled his homer with Bressler on base to give the home boys a lead they managed to retain, although the Reds came uncomfortably close in the seventh.

Heilmann Bunts Safely.

Heilmann started it by beating out a bunt, and Ford and Durocher followed with singles to fill the bases. A marvelous bare-hand stop of Durocher's blow by Wright prevented a score for the moment.

On a perfect double-play ball to Gilbert, however, two runs came in.

EMPIRE CITY DERBY TO QUESTIONNAIRE

REPENTANCE EASY VICTOR

Greatorex Second in Wakefield Handicap—King's Charmer, 50-1 Shot, Takes Opener.

By BRYAN FIELD.

James Butler, president of the Empire City Racing Association these many years, won his first Empire City Derby yesterday when his crack colt Questionnaire ran in front from start to finish to win as he pleased from three others, one of which was his stable-mate, Awake.

William Ziegler Jr. is owner of the other pair, Gone Away and Spinach, and they finished in the order named back of Questionnaire and ahead of Awake.

Questionnaire now is a quadruple stake winner at the meeting, having captured the Mount Vernon and Yonkers Handicaps and the Mount Kisco Stakes previous to his triumph at a mile and a quarter yesterday. In all, he was won five races at this meeting, and for the season has won seven out of ten starts, never having finished out of the money. His impressive record sent the son of Sting and Miss Puzzle to the post a 1-to-4 favorite. And he ran like one to earn $6,650.

Track Record Held by Sire.

Five lengths was Questionnaire's margin of victory, but he was so much the best that he could have won by a greater distance had Jockey Mack Garner urged him. As it was, he coasted home in 2:05 4-5, considerably behind the track record of 2:03, which is held by Sting, Questionnaire's sire. That was set in 1924, and Sting carried the very light burden of ninety-eight pounds.

Questionnaire's impost was 119 and he was conceding seven pounds to each of the others. Drawn in No. 1 post position, he made a procession of the race right from the start. Garner gave him his head and he came past the stands romping.

Going around the clubhouse, Spinach ran into second position and in the back stretch forced Questionnaire to let out a link. But on the far turn Questionnaire again drew off and came into the stretch going easily.

Meantime, Gone Away was pushed hard by Charley Kurtsinger to take over the running which was given

Night Baseball Edging Nearer the Majors; Giants Will Test the Plan at Bridgeport

Night baseball is edging still closer to the majors, for now the Giants intend to put this latest venture to a test. According to present plans the McGrawmen will play an exhibition game in Bridgeport under floodlights next month. The date has not been definitely determined, but will be set for either Aug. 6 or 7, both of which are open dates in the Giants' National League schedule.

A test of the lighting system which permits the playing of baseball at night also will be made at the Polo Grounds while the Giants are away on their Western trip next month when two semi-pro teams will be invited to play.

The first hint that the major leagues were leaning toward the trend to night games, which is increasingly evident in all sports, came when the Cincinnati Reds announced they would subject the plan to a test. On Wednesday the Reds will play under floodlights in Indianapolis against the American Association Club. Incidentally, so successful has the venture proved in Indianapolis that the attendance has been tripled.

On Thursday night Newark played the Jersey City club at the latter's park and the game drew 10,000 fans, a near-capacity crowd.

There are more minor league teams playing at night now than in the daytime. In the Eastern League, Springfield, alone of the four clubs comprising the circuit, has not yet installed floodlights at its home park, but expects to do so by early August. Bridgeport recently completed the lighting arrangements, while Allentown and Albany turned some time ago to the nocturnal program.

If the majors finally decide on the switch, the Polo Grounds will need comparatively few alterations to permit games after sundown. Soccer has been played alternately at the home of the Giants for the past three years.

The forthcoming tests of the night games by the major leagues recalls what is happening in other fields of sport. In Chicago a plan is under way designed to permit golf after dusk; in Toledo the Grand Circuit racing meet has proved decidedly popular, while in football the metropolitan district will get a chance to see its first contest at night on Oct. 10. On that date Manhattan College will meet Oglethorpe at the Polo Grounds.

Argentina Defeats U. S. Team In World's Title Soccer, 6-1

U. S. ARMY ANNEXES JUNIOR POLO TITLE

JONES MAKES SIX GOALS

Wilkinson Also Gets Six at Rumson—Victory Sends Army Into Herbert Cup Final.

By VERNON VAN NESS.

Special to The New York Times.

RUMSON, N. J., July 26.—Once more the names of an army team will be inscribed upon the historic cup which represents the national junior polo championship, for today on Herbert Memorial Field at the Rumson Country Club, a hard riding, accurate shooting and fast thinking team of United States Army officers triumphed in the final.

Their opponents were the Whippany River riders, who fought gallantly, but futilely against the concerted attacks of the army and went to defeat 17 to 7.

The victory added one more junior title to the long and impressive list which has been compiled by army combinations. Their first triumph in the championship tourney was in 1922. They repeated again the following year and won again in 1925 and captured the trophy in the two succeeding years.

In today's match there were two veteran junior title army riders, Captain C. A. Wilkinson, who rode at No. 1 in 1927 and Captain Peter P. Rodes, who was the brilliant No. 3 of the team that triumphed in 1925.

General Ely Presents Cup.

After the match had been closed with a final desperate, but fruitless effort by the Whippany River four that netted one goal, the eight riders dismounted and marched to a spot in front of the crowded gallery just in front of the clubhouse and there Captain Wilkinson received the cup on behalf of the Army team, the presentation being made by Major Gen. Hanson E. Ely, commanding the second corps area.

The match will go down in the records of the junior title play as one of the most sensational ever played in the tournament, even though the score was one-sided, the chief reason being that the Army displayed the most amazing team-play it has shown this season or for that matter, that has come out of either the junior title play or the Herbert Memorial Cup tourney being played concurrently with the junior series and still to be decided.

Incidentally, the victory brought Army into the finals of the Herbert Memorial Cup play, for today's game was both a junior and a Herbert Memorial match. In compiling the score for the latter series, however, three goals are added to the Whippany River total, that being the difference between their aggregate handicap and Army's. Thus the final score in the Memorial Cup series stands at 17 to 10.

Army in Herbert Final.

The latter final will be played Tuesday, it was decided today and Army will clash with the winner of the match tomorrow between the Old Oaks and the Greentrees.

To single out one of the four Army riders for the hero rôle would be almost impossible, so nearly perfect was the play of each. True, Lieutenant McDonald Jones, again flashed vividly, producing sparkling plays and wonderful shots, but against the six goals that he scored to bring his total to twenty-four in three games, Captain Wilkinson also matched six, gained no less arduously.

Yet, by no count of goals could one select the star. The hero was four men combined into one who played so brilliantly as to overwhelm the Whippany River riders. Combination play proved to be the forte of the Army in its games reaching up to the final, but in those two previous

By WILLIAM D. RICHARDSON.

Special to The New York Times.

ANCASTER, Ont., July 26.—Shattering the record for the Hamilton Golf Club course with a sterling 64 on his final round, Tommy Armour, brilliant Scottish professional who won the national open title in 1927, tied Leo Diegel of Agua Caliente, the defending champion, for the Canadian open championship today. Their 72-hole total was 277, the lowest ever made in the Dominion event. Armour's 64 was six under par.

Johnny Farrell, Quaker Ridge professional, finished third, one stroke behind, while Macdonald Smith of Lakeville and Tony Manero of Elmsford, tied for fourth, one stroke behind Farrell. Walter Hagen was sixth with 280. Armour and Diegel will play off the tie tomorrow.

Memory fails to recall a single day packed with so many brilliant rounds of golf and so many thrills as there were at the Hamilton Golf Club today. Going into the final round, the struggle for the title, won by Diegel for the fourth time at Kanawaki last year with a total of 274, indications pointed to a four-cornered battle among Manero, who led the field with a 54-hole score of 208; Farrell, who had 209, and Diegel and Hagen, who were deadlocked at 210.

Armour's Cause Seemed Lost.

Armour, who had finished the last two holes badly in the morning, appeared to be hopelessly out of the running, for he was five strokes back of Manero, and besides Farrell, Diegel and Manero, he trailed Lex Robson and Nicol Thompson, two Canadian professionals, and Macdonald Smith and Al Watrous.

Even the most optimistic of Tommy's followers believed that he had left himself too much to do by taking those two 5s on the two finishing holes in the third round. It simply looked like a hopeless proposition.

But when Armour gets into one of his inspired moods nothing appears hopeless to him. He had to make an inspired finish to tie Harry Cooper in the national open at Oakmont in 1927 and to catch the flying Harry in the play-off.

When he started, 5, 4, 4 his prospects grew even dimmer. But right there Tommy began what will be an ever-remembered spurt.

Armour and Diegel were partners on the round and their stretch duel was one of the most gripping matches ever witnessed. With all those 3s, several of them the result of fifteen-foot putts, Armour succeeded in picking up only one stroke on Leo, who went out in 33 himself.

Ball Rolls Onto Green.

There was still two strokes difference between them when they halved the short thirteenth, then Tommy took the fourteenth and fifteenth. They halved the next two and that put it up to the final green. Both hit good drives, but Armour was left with a downhill lie. Here he got a decided break of good luck.

He half-topped his ball and it flew out, yards off line. But it kicked off the side of a hill and onto the green twenty feet from the pin. Diegel was a trifle nearer and almost succeeded in running his down after Armour had missed. Thus they defeated Farrell by a stroke but were still tied for the title. Diegel had finished with a 67.

Those were two great rounds of golf, but they would have been produced in vain if Farrell had not made a costly mistake of judgment on the eleventh hole. Johnny, with four fifteen-foot putts for as many birdies on the second, third, fourth and fifth holes, had the championship tied in a knot when he reached the turn in 32. Par on the next nine holes would have put the championship beyond the range of Armour, Diegel or any one else.

Starts Back with Par 4.

Farrell started back with a par 4 on the tenth. The eleventh is a dog-leg. Johnny tried to bite off distance and his ball landed among the trees. All he could do was knock it out and it was still in the rough so that he was unable to reach the green on his next and took a 6. Shaken a bit by that experience, he hooked his drive into the rough playing the next hole and took a 5.

The conclusion of the third round saw Thompson dropped out of first place, which he had held from the start of the tournament. A stroke in the lead when the round started—his total being 137—the veteran Canadian professional held on grimly for the first nine and was in a good position until he came to the last two holes, in spite of the loss of two strokes to par on the eleventh and thirteenth. He was unable to get home with his second shot at the seventeenth and took a 5 there.

U. S. Fencing Team Vanquishes Great Britain In International Matches at London, 25-23

By The Associated Press.

LONDON, July 26. — International fencing matches between the United States and Great Britain terminated tonight with the visitors victorious by 25 points to 23, total for all three weapons.

The American and English fencing teams opened their international three-weapon competition for the Colonel Robert Thompson trophy in London on Thursday night by breaking even in the sixteen foils matches, the score at the end of the initial night's contests being tied, 8 to 8.

F. S. Righeimer Jr. was the best performer for the Americans in the foils, winning three and losing only one of his four matches. J. F. Potter and J. R. Huffman each won two of their four foils encounters, whereas C. C. Shears, the other member of the American foils delegation, bowed to three of his four opponents.

The individual laurels for the Thursday night's foils matches were captured by J. C. Lloyd of the English team, who was victorious in every one of his four matches. Major A. D. Pearce accounted for three of the English points by winning all except one of his matches. M. J. Badington-Smith tallied the other English point by scoring one victory in four matches, and Major P. G. Doyne, the fourth English representative, met defeat in every one of his foils encounters.

Superiority in the épée competition held in London on Friday night gave the American team what proved to be its margin of victory in the three-weapon competition.

The Americans outscored their rivals, 10 to 6, in the épée events to take an 18 to 14 lead at the end of the second night's competition, and the advantage was too great for the English saber representatives to overcome in the third and final series of matches held yesterday. Four of the first five épée matches on Friday night were won by two Americans, W. H. Russell and A. B. Miller.

Rogers, Irish Tennis Star, Beats Nunns for Canadian Title; Miss Wade Victor

CANADIAN NET TITLE IS WON BY ROGERS

Irish Davis Cup Star Beats Nunns of Toronto in Final, 6-4, 8-6, 0-6, 9-7.

MISS WADE RETAINS CROWN

Tops Miss M. Leeming, 6-4, 2-6, 6-3 —Hall and Mercur Gain Doubles Championship.

TORONTO, July 26 (AP).—Lyttleton Rogers of Dublin, Ireland, Irish Davis Cup star, won the Canadian singles lawn tennis championship today when he defeated Gilbert Nunns of Toronto in the final match by three sets to one after a thrilling battle. The scores were 6—4, 8—6, 0—6, 9—7.

This marks the first occasion on which the Canadian singles championship has gone to Ireland.

The battle between the Irish and Canadian Davis Cup players was hectic with many of the games going to deuce. Rogers, who reached the final by defeating J. Gilbert Hall of South Orange, N. J., three sets to one yesterday, had the edge on Nunns throughout the struggle.

Drizzle Fails to Halt Play.

In the second set Nunns carried Rogers to fourteen games before the latter won, and the Canadian came back to make the third a love set. Undaunted by a steady drizzle, the players went through the concluding set with Rogers pulling the game out of the fire half a dozen times when his opponent seemed a certain winner.

Nunns played magnificently, but the marvelous gets by Rogers and his nonchalance in face of a crisis evoked the admiration of a large crowd, who gave him a hearty ovation at the close.

Playing in her first tournament after recovery from a severe illness, Miss Olive Wade, young Toronto player, successfully defended her title of Canadian women's singles champion today against Miss Marjorie Leeming of Victoria, B. C. Miss Wade won by scores of 6—4, 2—6, 6—3.

The match, which was played on the grounds of the Toronto Tennis Club, was a grueling affair, and at the end of the second set Miss Wade was very tired. She came back, however, to win the third set and match in short order.

Nunns and Martin Beaten.

Fritz Mercur of Bethlehem, Pa., and Hall won the men's doubles championship by a hard-earned victory over Nunns and Walter Martin of Toronto, 11—9, 6—2, 6—4.

The Misses Marjorie and Hope Leeming won the women's doubles championship by defeating Mrs. H. [illegible]ckle and Miss B. Symons of Toronto in the final, 6—3, 6—3.

D. S. MacQuisten of Montreal won the junior title when he defeated [illegible]ird Watt, also of Montreal, in the final by the score of 4—6, 7—5, 6—0, 6—3.

Miss Marjorie Leeming and John [illegible]roctor, Toronto, defeated Miss Effie [illegible]illing, Montreal, and J. De Lara, University of Southern California, in the semi-finals of the mixed doubles, 6—2, 7—5. They thus qualified to play Mrs. Beer, Ottawa, and C. W. Aikman, Montreal, in the final.

Wear Hopeful for U. S. Victory After Phone Talk With Dixon

PHILADELPHIA, July 26 (AP).—Joseph W. Wear, chairman of the United States Davis Cub Tennis Committee, after a telephone talk with Fitz Eugene Dixon, non-playing captain of the American team, in France this afternoon, said there still is a good chance to bring the Davis Cup back to this country.

Dixon told Mr. Wear the players were disappointed in losing the doubles match. Dixon said Bill Tilden is playing superb tennis, and that if Lott defeats Borotra tomorrow in the first singles match the players feel that Tilden will beat Cochet and bring back the cup.

ing a drive between them. The third game was a love game on Brugnon's serve and the stands were going frantic in applause.

Allison and Van Ryn rallied in the next stage and evened the score by fast play, thanks chiefly to Cochet's nets and outs.

The Americans were visibly delivering their attack on Brugnon, who did not falter under the bombardment, and though he lost points now and then, it was only after making sometimes six and eight pretty returns, and just as frequently he came out victor.

Allison Is Erratic.

Allison was playing erratically. He netted and drove wild far beyond the back lines, sometimes with seeming carelessness. Then again he made several magnificent running overhand smashes and placements. He was not playing in form, however, and it is not unfair to him to say that his errors—over sixty nets and outs in three sets—lost the contest for the United States.

In the Davis Cup matches Allison has been clearly off form, making a poor showing in all contests with Italy, and, though reserved in the challenge round for this one battle with France, failed to approach his past performances. Maybe his splendid effort at Wimbledon broke him down or maybe that endeavor devoted to turn himself into a singles champion spoiled his teamwork and clogged that perfectly functioning machine that was Allison and Van Ryn in their appearance here a year ago.

The next three games went to the Frenchmen, who then started out and took the second set in driving fashion. Both sides played brilliant tennis in this encounter, and there were moments during some volleys enduring to ten or twelve exchanges when the tension at the spectacle was snapped with a gasp before the thunderous applause broke for one side or other.

Cochet made some superb returns, one, for example, when sensing a coming play, he ran across the whole court into a corner and retrieved Van Ryn's drive.

But the admiration of the crowd was for Brugnon. With an imperturbable slam, he received ball after ball that was smashed at him, first from one opponent, then the other, and got them back somehow over the net, not always with the necessary power, but often so well placed that they scored points or allowed Cochet to kill the return that followed.

Only once during the match did the Allison and Van Ryn combination work in unison. This was in the third set, when, with the exception of only one game, they marched straight for victory. Brugnon was weakening in this set from the severe attack on him, and Cochet had lost control.

When the Frenchmen came back for the next set they were fighting to win. They had every advantage and had found their opponents' weakness in Allison. They had the spectators keyed to a delirious pitch of excitement, shouting their favor after every point they scored.

American Players Routed.

The Americans were routed. They fought hard and doggedly and many volleys went long, but the breaks seemed to fall on the other side of the court. Three games ran to deuce, and even when the score stood 5—love they made a determined effort and took one love game on Allison's serve.

In the next game Cochet's serving worked to match point at 40—15, but the Americans stood solidly and fought gamely. They wouldn't give in and in the last game were coolly fighting until Allison, on a backhand drive, drove the last ball out.

The crowd stood and applauded Brugnon for five minutes, and when the players were called before the President, leaning down he shook hands with Brugnon first. Then in turn President Doumergue shook hands with Cochet, Allison and Van Ryn, but the cheers continued for Brugnon.

"Toto! Vive Toto!" the crowd yelled hoarsely and the quiet, steady player had a moment of triumph that will long be remembered in tennis history.

Bell-Mangin Win Exhibition.

AUTEUIL, France, July 26 (AP).—The Americans won some consolation and a great deal of applause following the Davis Cup doubles today in an exhibition affair between Berkley Bell and Gregory Mangin and the French pair, René Debuzelet and Christian Boussus. The Americans, with no Davis Cup at stake, gave a better exhibition than Wilmer Allison and John Van Ryn and won in five sets, 4—6, 0—6, 6—3, 6—4, 6—4. Most of the crowd stayed for the second match and enjoyed it.

KYNASTON TENNIS VICTOR.

Special to The New York Times.

CRAWFORD NOTCH, N. H., July 26.—Percy Kynaston of Brooklyn won the men's championship from A. F. Von Bernuth of Montclair, N. J., 6—0, 9—7, 6—0, at the Crawford Notch Tennis Club today.

In the men's doubles final, Malcolm T. Hill and H. L. Johnson of Waban defeated W. M. Hall and Valentine Gress of New Jersey, 6—1, 6—3.

The mixed doubles title was won by Mr. and Mrs. W. Merrill Hall, who defeated Mr. and Mrs. M. T. Hill, 6—3, 6—4.

Sports of the Times

Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

By JOHN KIERAN.

THOSE Frenchmen must have been only fooling at Wimbledon. After the defeat of Allison and Van Ryn in the doubles yesterday, local tennis followers were estimating our Davis Cup chances at 50 centimes, or approximately 2 cents, current rate of exchange.

We still have a faint far chance at Auteuil, but pessimistic observers are for building a couple of new courts and starting all over again. One half the world may not know how the other half lives, but our tennis players now know how British golfers have been feeling ever since Bob Jones and Walter Hagen took to traveling.

Despondency is so deep at the moment that tennis followers here expect advance stories of the approach of the American singles players to the last matches to start with the simple statement: "The condemned men ate a hearty breakfast."

But Tilden might beat Cochet, and Borotra might be vanquished in the remaining match. It isn't probable, but we might as well cling to that last ray of hope until the score comes in.

We can hardly complain that the French are out of order in clinging to the Davis Cup so tenaciously. We were selfish enough to hold it for seven straight years. Turn about is fair play.

For that matter, we've been holding the British open golf trophy since 1924, and it isn't even our property.

Which recalls that golf is a young man's game, but Willie Macfarlane waltzed off with the metropolitan open title, and the feature of the play for the Canadian open championship was the fine sprint put on by Nicol Thompson, over 50 and carrying weight for age.

Macfarlane was teaching golf when Gene Sarazen was trying to learn marbles and when Bob Jones was making all his approaches in a baby-tender. Always a fine player and a perfect stylist, Macfarlane merely dropped in at tournaments when he thought he needed a vacation from teaching. He's the fellow who won the open at Worcester in 1925 by picking up five strokes on Bob Jones in the last nine holes of the play-off. It sounds impossible, but Willie from Aberdeen did it.

Here and There.

Gordie Brydson, who played hockey with the Toronto Maple Leafs last season, won the Ontario open golf championship this year. Hec Kilrea, the flying forward of the Ottawa Senators, is a golf pro in the Summer season and so is Normie Himes of the star-spangled Americans.

Lionel Conacher is a courageous fellow. He refereed a big lacrosse game in Canada recently. They say that's as dangerous as umpiring a ball game in St. Louis.

The only friend that umpires have in St. Louis is an undertaker, who meets them at the trains in his big limousine and takes them to and from the ball park every day. Skeptics say he is just hanging around waiting for business.

Beans Reardon, the National League umpire, said to Adam Comorosky of the Pirates, who spent five years in the hard-coal pits: "You oughta be pulling for night baseball. You could put that miners' lamp on your cap and feel right at home in the dark."

Joe McCarthy of the Cubs attended a night game of baseball and said it looked all right to him. Bill Veeck, president of the Chicago club, said that it looked like a faster and more spectacular game under the lamps than it does in broad daylight.

Fielders and batters seem to find little difficulty playing the night game, but pitchers object to it. They cool out too rapidly. That could be remedied by giving them steam-heated uniforms.

Odds and Ends.

Any ball club looks good when it is winning. The Cubs loked fine at Ebbets Field and terrible at the Polo Grounds. The team that turned in the best work at the Polo Grounds during the invasion from the West was Cincinnati.

The Cubs have three pitchers on whom they can bank for reasonably frequent good performances, Bush, Root and Malone. Sam Jones of the Senators says that three good pitchers aren't enough these days, but what team has more than that? The Mackmen are breezing along with Walberg, Earnshaw and Grove and Walberg has to be sent on short vacations to the golf links.

Waite Hoyt lost another argument to his former chums, the Yankees, but it wasn't Waite's fault. He could have sued the Tigers for non-support. The Detroit outfielders did everything but catch easy flies, and the infielders spent the afternoon drop-kicking grounders around the lot.

The Yanks have played plenty of bad ball in the West, but they managed to pull out a number of victories just the same. It really doesn't make much difference, considering the way the Athletics have been going. The way things are shaping up, nothing can halt the Mackmen now except a train wreck.

It isn't that way in the National League. That's still a battle royal. The Cubs mauled the Robins around, and then the Giants made the Cubs jump through the hoop.

The Phillies made thirty runs in two games and lost both of them, indicating that William F. Baker may have to take the mound himself to stem the tide. The Philly pitchers are said to be in favor of night baseball with no lights turned on at all. That would give them an even chance with the batters.

MRS. STENZ GAINS STATE TENNIS FINAL

Eliminates Miss Roberts, 6-3, 6-4, in Semi-Finals of Clay Court Tournament.

Two hard-fought matches marked the semi-final round of the women's New York State clay court singles championships at the Jackson Heights Tennis Club yesterday. There were no upsets, but each of the two singles matches were hard fought before they were decided.

In the opener Miss Norma Taubele, New York, defeated Miss Grace Surber, Jackson Heights, in three sensational sets, 6—4, 4—6, 6—4, while Mrs. Bernard F. Stenz, Florida State champion and seeded No. 1, conquered Miss Caroline Roberts of New Rochelle, 6—3, 6—4.

Miss Taubele was seeded second, Miss Roberts third and Miss Surber fourth.

It was mother against daughter in one of the two doubles semi-finals which followed the singles. The Eastern and New Jersey State championship doubles team of Miss Taubele and Miss Roberts met and defeated Mrs. Rose Taubele, mother of Norma, and Mrs. Ly Cremonian, 6—4, 6—1. Miss Surber also engaged in the doubles semi-finals, and here, paired with Mrs. Theodore De M. Johnson, she was defeated by Mrs. Gwendolyn J. Burt and Miss Ruth McCabe, 2—6, 4—6.

The finals in both the singles and doubles will be held today, play starting at 2:30 P. M.

HAMMELL AGAIN WINS DELAWARE NET TITLE

Retains State Clay Court Trophy by Scoring Over Gilpin in Final, 6-2, 7-5, 6-2.

Special to The New York Times.

WILMINGTON, Del., July 26.—Bertram Hammell, recently graduated Swarthmore captain, retained his Delaware State clay court tennis championship when he defeated Samuel B. Gilpin of the Merion Cricket Club, 6—2, 7—5, 6—2, in the final round on the du Pont Country Club courts today.

Gilpin has two legs on the trophy, having last won the event in 1928. He traveled through the present event to the finals like a cyclone, losing no sets and few games. Hammell's all-around play bewildered the Merion veteran, who was also slowed up by the heat after the second set.

Miss Cecilia Riegel of the Germantown Cricket Club retained the women's Delaware State clay court title, defeating Laura Pittinger of Haddonfield, N. J., in the final, 6—1, 6—1.

Harold Lane of Cynwyd and Bertram Hammell, the singles champion, lifted the men's doubles championship, in a keen final match with Tom Nicely and Richard Bon, both of Swarthmore, by the scores of 3—6, 7—5, 6—3.

Barry Wood Tennis Victor.

SWAMPSCOTT, Mass., July 26.—W. Barry Wood Jr., Harvard's all-around athlete, won the men's North Shore tennis final today when he defeated R. Lockwood Tower, a member of the Harvard varsity tennis team, 6—4, 4—6, 6—3, 9—7.

CALIFORNIANS WIN IN DOUBLES FINAL

MANCHESTER, Mass., July 26.—Miss Edith Cross and Mrs. Lawrence A. Harper of California, seeded No. 1, conquered the Eastern team of Miss Virginia Hilleary of Philadelphia and Miss Dorthy Andrus of Stamford, Conn., to give the West its share of the honors in the annual women's invitation tennis tournament at the Essex County Club today.

The East was victorious yesterday when Miss Marjorie Morrill of Manchester and Dedham, Mass., defeated Miss Marjorie Gladman of California in the final of the singles.

The first set of today's match was closely contested, the Misses Hilleary and Andrus leading at 4—2 and 5—4, but the California team rallied to win at 8—6.

Miss Cross and Mrs. Harper won more convincingly in the second chapter, scoring at 6—3 after their opponents had remained even at 2—all.

In the mixed doubles final Miss Gladman and Clifford Sutter of Tulane University, intercollegiate champion, won from Miss Cross and Bayon, 6—2, 6—3.

pitched out short, flubbed the next and had to take a 6 for a 74, which left him tied for fourth place, three strokes behind Manero, who had another spectacular 32 on the last nine for a 70, to give him the lead with a total of 208.

Diegel made a great finish for his 69, coming home in 34. Leo began with seven 4s to be out in 35. Two under 4s with two holes to play, the defending champion hit a wonderful mongrel iron shot home on the seventeenth. Then he hit the flag on the home hole, where he sunk a four-footer for a 3.

The best round of golf played this morning was the 66 done by Lex Robson, professional at the Islington Golf Club in Toronto. He had four 3s on the first nine to be out in 32 and came home in 34, which made his total 211, tied with Thompson and Macdonald Smith.

NEER, FEIBLEMAN WIN 3-SET MATCH

Eliminate Washburn and Behr, 4-6, 8-6, 6-1, in East Hampton Net Event.

MATHEY AND HERNDON LOSE

Bow to Gill and MacPherson, 6-3, 3-6, 7-5—Wood and Blaner Survive Second Round.

Special to The New York Times.

EAST HAMPTON, L. I., July 26.—Play in the annual men's invitation doubles tennis tournament advanced through the second round today on the Maidstone Club courts with Watson Washburn and Karl Behr, favorites in the event, eliminated by Phil Neer and Edward Feibleman in the second round, 4—6, 8—6, 6—1.

Another highly regarded team also was defeated today when Commander Charles C. Gill of Washington and A. W. MacPherson won from Dean Mathey and Edward Herndon, 6—3, 3—6, 7—5.

Neer and Feibleman played hard, consistent tennis to conquer Washburn and Behr. After losing the first set they came from behind in the second to win and captured the third easily when their veteran opponents began to tire.

Sidney Wood Jr. and Blaner played sterling tennis to eliminate Bryon Hamlin and Dr. Arthur Neergaard in the first round and Lawrence Baker and H. C. Johnson in the second.

VINES TOPS SHIELDS IN FIVE-SET BATTLE

By ALLISON DANZIG.

to play second fiddle and whose backhand was a thing of beauty.

Along with these beautifully and drastically executed ground strokes, whose direction was seldom to be fathomed before the ball left the racquet, the Californian showed a facility and finality in his forehand volleying that made it well-nigh impossible to pass him on his right side.

Overhead, his smashing was so conclusive that Shields rarely tossed up a lob, and his service came over the net like rifle fire. It was not until the second set that the full force of Vines's service was unleashed.

The meeting between Hunter and Burns was a disappointing anticlimax. Burns failed to sustain his form of the earlier rounds and only at intervals did he make the most of his fine repertoire of strokes.

The Brooklyn youth seemed to have a wholesome respect for the cudgels and record of the Davis Cup veteran, and once Hunter opened up his heaviest batteries, after losing the first two games, Burns's game went into a decline. Unless all the signs are misleading, Hunter will find himself in a much stiffer battle this afternoon.

Vines gained a second victory over Shields late in the afternoon. Returning to the courts with Keith Gledhill, with whom he holds the national junior title, he and his fellow Californian defeated Shields and Morton Bernstein, New York State champions, 6—4, 6—4, 3—6, 7—5.

In the other semi-final, Jack Tidball and Jerry Bartosh defeated S. Howard Voshell and Elmer Griffin, 9—7, 2—6, 3—6, 7—5, 6—0.

Metropolitan Singles.

Semi-final Round—Ellsworth Vines defeated Frank Shields, 2—6, 6—3, 6—4, 5—7, 12—10; Francis T. Hunter defeated F. W. Burns, 6—4, 6—3, 6—4.

Semi-final Round—Vines and Gledhill defeated Shields and Morten Bernstein, 6—4, 6—3, 3—6, 7—5; Jack Tidball and Jerry Bartosh defeated Voshell and Griffin, 9—7, 2—6, 3—6, 7—5, 6—0.

Championship of International Federation Lies Between Two Victorious Teams.

HAMBURG, Germany, July 26.—After sixteen completed rounds of the team tournament of the International Chess Federation, the championship, won twice before by Hungary, rests between that country and Poland, which have outdistanced every one of the other sixteen competing nations as a result of play in the semi-final round today.

Both of the leading teams made scores of 4—0 today, Poland winning from Iceland in the first session and Hungary following suit against Finland in the second. Star Class Race at West Hampton Club's Weekly Regatta Is Won by Chuckle

CHUCKLE DEFEATS STAR CLASS RIVALS

MEDINA'S ETHEL IS VICTOR

Special to The New York Times.

WEST HAMPTON BEACH, L. I., July 26.—For the first time this Summer yachtsmen of the Yacht Racing Squadron of the West Hampton Country Club had a satisfactory breeze for their week-end regatta on Moriches Bay today. The wind was east by south and had enough strength to send the craft around courses off the Speonk shore in good time.

Although the winner in the race for the Star Class today was Chuckle, owned by H. C. and Miss E. Halsted, the championship of the July series was taken by Wings, the property of Carl and John Pflug. The final race in the Moriches Bay division was won by Ethel, owned by H. R. Medina. The championship went to Alan Mark's Rhapsody.

By winning the race today, H. Meislahn's Montauk annexed the July championship among the Indian boats. In the Shore Bird division, today's race was taken by Avocet, owned by G. M. Simes, but the title went to H. E. Post Jr.'s Red Head. Mrs. Newton H. Day's No. 57 not only won the race for the first division of Class S. S., but also took the championship.

Rerigging of the Whirlwind Delays Her Tests Under Sail

So many changes have been necessary in rerigging the America's Cup yacht Whirlwind, because of the stepping forward of her mast, that it was said yesterday she could not be put under sail again before tomorrow at the earliest, and more likely Tuesday.

All the fastenings of the shrouds at the deck, as well as the stays forward, have had to be changed. It is hoped to complete the work tomorrow afternoon.

helm during race week; A. W. Johnston's ten-meter Nachvak, Priscilla III, Roulette III, Nautilus, J. S. Johnson's six-meter Aphrodite with C. Sherman Hoyt at the helm today; Miss Whittelsey in Flash; Howard McMichael's Grey Fox, an International Star Class boat which sailed today in the first division for this class, and W. R. Eimer's Victory Class boat, Gopher.

Last Saturday there were three fewer boats than today. However, this year's figures for the annual race week did not come up to last year's when there was a daily average of 242 boats throughout the week and a record number of 257 starting in one day.

Istalena Last Across Line.

In the Class M race Istalena was the last to get over the starting line, as Avatar, Floyd Carlisle's boat, and Simba reached out ahead on the starboard tack. Istalena was to windward, however, and shortly after she slid past the prow of the committee boat Satanstoe, the old converted submarine destroyer, she split tacks and worked out again to deep water.

Simla and Avatar worked in toward the shore for a little while, but soon came about, Simba gaining an advantage by several lengths. The windward work to the first buoy, one-half mile southwest of Captain Island Light, favored Istalena. She outdid her rivals to the first mark. From this point it was a matter of broad reaching across Long Island Sound to Matinicock Point and then another broad reach, or almost a run down wind, to finish.

The boats had all their sails set, and spinnakers and ballooners were pulling hard as the boats tried vainly to outdo one another. Istalena's lead gained on the windward leg, and the one across the Sound, however, was too great for either of the others to overcome.

The best finish today came in the Atlantic Coast one-design class when Miss Whittelsey brought Flash across the finish line three seconds ahead of Bill McHugh in Mistral. Four boats in this division crossed the line less than ten second apart.

Flash, Mistral, Rumour, Bill Crow's boat, and Noiram, belonging to Kingsley Kunhardt, all got around the second mark at about the same time.

On the final run to the finish line Flash and Rumour took a close reach across the Sound, bringing them away to windward of the finish. On the other hand, Mistral and Noiram, after rounding the second mark, bore to westward, taking them down the wind.

When the quartet had come within a quarter of a mile of the line Mistral and Noiram were ahead. By this time, however, Rumour and Flash were straightening out and standing for the finish on almost an equal reach with Mistral and Noiram.

About a hundred feet from the line Flash began to pull ahead, passing Rumour and then Mistral. Flash stayed in front and the closest kind of a finish resulted.

SPEEDBOATS SINK IN MAINE REGATTA

Two Craft, Valued at $35,000, Go Down in 55 Feet of Water—Drivers Uninjured.

Special to The New York Times.

CAMDEN, Me., July 26.—Two spills which sent $35,000 worth of New England-owned hydroplanes to the bottom in fifty-five feet of water off the harbor entrance marked the final day of the Camden Yacht Club's second annual speedboat regatta. Miss Maine, owned by Ed Curtis of Portland, overturned while rounding a buoy in the second heat of the hydroplane class and sank before Coast Guards could get to her. In the first heat Sparrow, owned by Elmer Johnson of Bennington, Vt., took a nose dive in rough water and finally sank when the ring bolt pulled out after salvage attempts were started. Neither driver was injured.

The Maine circuit title trophy went to Reece Hatchitt of Beechhurst, L. I., with a total of 7,082 points. Frank Wigglesworth of Boston won the runabout title with more than 7,500 points.

HYDROPLANE RACE IS SET FOR RED BANK

151-Cubic Inch Class Coming Back Into Favor, List of Entries Indicates.

HARMSWORTH PLANS FIXED

Great Water Carnival to Include 34 Events—Col. E. H. Green Trophy Race This Week.

By VERNON VAN NESS.

The hydroplane of the 151-cubic-inch class, once the greatest of the speed boat racing craft, but which suffered a severe decline when drivers of this type of boat deserted to the ranks of the outboard speedsters, is coming back with a smash. The largest fleet that has been assembled in recent years will compete in the Gold Cup regatta at Red Bank, N. J., on Aug. 16 and 17, it was announced yesterday by the New Jersey Gold Cup Association and the American Power Boat Association, sponsors of the Gold Cup classic.

That the 151-inch hydroplane is about to resume a major place in the speed boat firmament has been received with much gratification by followers of the water sport. There was a time when the hydroplane excelled at all regattas and it was this type, through various stages of development, that made possible the great speed records.

Powered with a 151-cubic-inch motor, the hydroplane furnished a class that made racing possible on a high plane yet without the great expense that is attached to the huge racing goliaths such as compete in the Harmsworth Trophy and the Gold Cup races.

The New Jersey Gold Cup Association already has officially received twelve entries for this class and there are assurances that three more will be entered. This is moer than double the number that has competed at any single regatta in a decade, according to the records of the American Power Boat Association.

Elaborate Program Fixed.

The Detroit Harmsworth Cup Committee, which is responsible for the staging of the five-day regatta Aug. 29 to Sept. 2, when the British International trophy will be at stake, has just announced its program for the big water carnival and it is doubtful if a more extensive one has ever been arranged in this country.

Of course, the Harmsworth Trophy race, in which Miss Marion B. Carstairs of England will compete against Gar Wood, the American holder of the trophy, will dominate the regatta, yet the supplementary events hold forth promise of furnishing many new records and a great deal of interesting racing.

The program for the five-day regatta brings the first heat of the Harmsworth race on Saturday, Aug. 30 and the second on Monday, Sept. 1. If the race is a tie after the first two heats the third heat will be raced on Tuesday, Sept. 2.

Thirty-four events have been programmed, which does not include the mile trials for records which will be staged on Sept. 2. One of the interesting classes is the 5½-liter, which was conceived by Sir Henry Segrave and Charles F. Chapman, the latter representing the American Power Boat Association. It is a class so restricted that building a boat for it will come within the means of the average sportsman.

Trophy Race at New Bedford.

The Colonel E. H. R. Green outboard trophy race will be staged on Wednesday and Thursday at New Bedford, Mass. This will be the first race for the trophy, probably the most valuable hung up in this country for outboard competition. It is a perpetual trophy, but a replica of it will go each year to the yacht club represented by the winning driver. A long program of events for the two days has been arranged for outboard drivers. The race is open only to amateur drivers of Divisions 1 and 2.

Tigers Pound Pipgras and McEvoy to Conquer Yankees in Third Game of Series

YANKS ARE BEATEN AS PITCHERS FAIL

Tigers Pound Pipgras and McEvoy for Five Runs Each and Triumph by 12 to 8.

FUNK FEATURES ATTACK

Drives Home Run With Bases Filled in 4th and in 8th Steals Home —Ruth Hurts Hand.

By WILLIAM E. BRANDT.

Special to The New York Times.

DETROIT, Mich., July 26.—George Pipgras and Lou McEvoy were pelted for five runs each by the enraged Tigers in the early stages of today's game and the Yanks, though they made sortie after sortie against Earl Whitehill, never caught up with the plump handicap imposed on them in the game's first half. The series, after yielding Yankee victories in its first two episodes, turned the other way today by the score of 12 to 8.

The game really never amounted to much after Gehringer rolled a triple past the scoreboard in the first inning. The 11,000 fans, however, extracted huge amusement from the rapidly mounting pile of Detroit runs.

Their big moment came in the fourth when Elias Funk, himself a Yank rookie at the 1929 training camp, poled a homer into the right field bleachers with the bases filled.

Gomez in Farewell.

This one big wallop by the little outfielder accounted for four of the five runs off McEvoy. For three innings subsequent to Funk's homer McEvoy shut down on the Tigers, allowing two hits and no runs. In the eighth, Vernon Gomez, who will report to the St. Paul Club tomorrow, pitched a farewell inning. Its features were two dashes from third to home by two Tigers while Gomez was taking a leisurely wind-up.

Both Tigers scored. Stone, who made the first rush, was safe when Hargrave dropped the ball after tagging him out. Then Funk topped off his sparkling afternoon by performing a clean steal of home. He started with the lanky Yankee youngster's wind-up and actually beat the ball to the home plate, sliding across just as the pitch thudded in Hargrave's mitt.

The early pelting of Pipgras was complicated by a mix-up between Pipgras and Lazzeri in fielding a bunt in the second inning. The whole game might have been different if that play had not gone amiss. Pipgras left with two out in the second, five runs in Detroit's locker, and the game very much against the visitors.

In the fourth the first eight Tigers that faced McEvoy reached first base. Two of them were retired at third base, but five of them scored. With things in that kind of shape, Manager Shawkey decided to switch the line-up around a bit.

Chapman in Star Rôle.

Ben Chapman was posted in Reese's place and proved the best hitter in the line-up today, clouting a double and a triple in three times at bat. He handled four easy fielding chances without slipping, making a complete success of his first attempt at playing second base for a major league club.

Shawkey also replaced Rice with Cooke, who hit a double in the eighth. Ruth chimed in with the line-up alterations by hurting his hand hitting a single in the sixth, so Combs worked in left field for the last few innings. The Babe said after the game that he will be back in the line-up tomorrow.

The Yankee scoring efforts never approximated their adversaries' pace. Dale Alexander, the local first baseman, was a bit lax in his fielding, especially in the sixth inning, when his two errors helped the Yanks to score three runs. But Whitehill, though he gave six passes, was always just good enough to turn back the Yanks whenever their attack began to look dangerous.

CHICAGO, July 26.—The White Sox made it three in a row over Washington today. The score was 4 to 1. The Senators acquired only four hits off Pat Caraway, three of the infield variety. The fourth was a triple which gave the Senators their only run.

The Sox scored their first run in the opening inning on Watwood's double, a sacrifice and an infield out. The three others went across in the sixth. Reynolds doubled and Fothergill ran for him. Jolley was passed. Barnes singled to centre and when Harris let the ball roll to the wall Fothergill, Jolley and Barnes crossed the plate.

ATHLETICS' HITTING TURNS BACK INDIANS

Hudlin Driven From Mound in First as Cochrane and Simmons Clout Circuit Blows.

FOXX ALSO SMASHES HOMER

Cleveland's Four-Run Rally in Ninth Falls One Short of Tying 10 to 9 Score.

Special to The New York Times.

CLEVELAND, Ohio, July 26.—The Indians failed to measure up in their third test against the world champion Athletics today, finishing on the short end of a 10 to 9 score.

Willis Hudlin was knocked from the mound in the first inning when Bishop walked, Cramer tripled, Cochrane hit over the right field screen and Simmons drove into the left field pavilion. Later in the game Foxx hit into the open pavilion in left for the longest homer ever made to that sector.

It was George Earnshaw's fourteenth victory of the season. Melvin Harder finished for Cleveland. The Indians made a gallant uphill fight, finally driving Earnshaw from the firing line under a barrage of hits in the ninth, but their rally netted them only four runs, one short of a tie score.

manager, and Chagnon supplanted him on the mound. The latter did reasonably well for a time, but in the seventh Terry, not quite satisfied with his two doubles, drove the ball to left centre for a homer inside the park, and in the eighth Fitzsimmons chose to surprise himself by plunking a homer into the upper left tier.

By this time, of course, the Pirates were quite out, though they did manage to come up with one more tally in the ninth when Traynor slapped a homer into the right-field stands.

Lively Ball Hurting the Game, Says McGraw, Inspecting Royals

MONTREAL, July 26 (Canadian Press)—"The lively ball is making baseball unpopular," said John J. McGraw, famous manager of the New York Giants, who was in Montreal yesterday to look over Manager Ed Holly's Royals.

"This lively ball is hurting baseball. I think the club owners ought to get together on it. I suppose six out of eight teams in each league would like to see it go. It has taken the confidence out of pitchers. The ball is so lively that fielders cannot handle it and throw it to the plate. Bunting is gone—the ball is too lively. And base running has disappeared. The public liked that. Those plays were always close."

BRAVES BREAK EVEN ON MARANVILLE DAY

Lose to Cards, 5-4, Then Win, 6-5, as Captain-Shortstop Receives Numerous Gifts.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, July 26.—Thirty-three thousand fans saw the Braves and the Cards split a double-header on Maranville Day at Braves Field today. The captain-shortstop of the Braves received an automobile, a chest of silver and numerous other gifts between the games, and $1,000 in gold.

A three-run rally by the Cards in the eighth inning of the first game gave that contest to the visitors, 5 to 4. The Braves won the final, 6 to 5, thanks to the sterling relief work of Pitcher Bob Smith and two great catches in far right by Clark. Acting Manager Frank Frisch of the Cards made four hits, stole a base and drove in two runs in the nightcap.

WILSON'S 3 HOMERS HELP CUBS TRIUMPH

Chicago Routs Phillies, 16 to 2, to Make Clean Sweep of Three-Game Series.

VICTORS POUND OUT 21 HITS

Collins and Willoughby Are Batted Hard—Malone and Hartnett Also Get Circuit Clouts.

Special to The New York Times.

PHILADELPHIA, July 26.—Hack Wilson's three home runs, increasing his season's total to thirty-two, featured another victory for the Cubs over the Phillies today, Chicago gaining a clean sweep of the three-game series by winning, 16 to 2.

Phil Collins, ace of the Phils' mound staff, allowed ten hits and was routed by a nine-run attack in the first two innings, and Willoughby, his successor, yielded the National League leaders eleven of their twenty-one hits in the next seven frames.

BUFFALO CAPTURES TWO.

Defeats Toronto in Opener, 7-3, Takes Final in Ninth, 6-3.

TORONTO, July 26 (AP).—Buffalo won two games from Toronto today, 7—3 and 6—3. The second game, originally intended as a seven-inning affair, went to the ninth before the Bisons hammered out their victory with a single by Cooney, a double by Munn, a triple by Mills and Sax's sacrifice.

The Bisons had overcome a three-run lead, gained by the Leafs in the first two innings, scoring the tying run in the sixth, when Phillips dropped Sheedy's perfect throw to the plate, enabling Moore to register.

N. Y. A. C. NINE LOSES TO MONTCLAIR A. C.

Victors Come From Behind to Win, 3-2, and Tie for Lead in Eastern Club League.

HOME CLUB RALLIES IN 7TH

Special to The New York Times.

MONTCLAIR, N. J., July 26.—The Montclair A. C. nine went into a tie for first place in the Eastern Athletic Club League by defeating the strong New York A. C., 3-2, today. Rallying in the seventh and eighth innings to score three runs, the home club found Burns for five hits after being held to a lone single during the first six innings.

Burke's triple to right scored Anderson with the first tally in the seventh inning to revive the hopes of the home club. Gunzleman's long sacrifice to Miller in deep centre scored Burke with the tying run.

Successive singles in the eighth by Starke, Newman and MacDonald netted Montclair the victory. A special series will be staged in September among Crescent A. C., Penn A. C. and Montclair A. C. to decide the title.

ROBINS BEAT REDS WITH LONG DRIVES

By ROSCOE McGOWEN.

Gilbert made the throw to Moore perfectly for a force-out at second, but Eddie tossed the ball backward as he attempted a swift relay to complete the two-ply killing. Phelps walked Lucas, batting for May, and Robbie walked Phelps.

Heimach came in to be greeted by sharp singles from Walker and Meusel and a chorus of disapproving shouts from the 15,000 fans, who had objected to Phelps's removal. But Stripp fouled to Gilbert to end the frame and leave the Reds still a run in arrears.

Herman's single, Bissonette's triple and Wright's single had given the Robins two runs in the fifth to bring their total to five. Gilbert made it six with his double that scored Lopez in the sixth, and he also batted in the seventh run in the eighth, following Frederick's twenty-eighth double of the season.

Vance's slow march to the mound to relieve Heimach after the latter had walked Cuccinello to start the eighth was accompanied by a mixed chorus of cheers and jeers, with the jeers having a little the better of it.

Vance promptly made a very wild pitch that advanced the runner, but, thereafter, he was master of the situation, save that Curt Walker got his usual hit in the ninth.

Couch Loses to Lehman in the Western Amateur Title Golf Final by 4 and 2

LEHMAN WINS TITLE IN WESTERN GOLF

Captures Crown by Beating Couch, Fellow-Chicagoan, 4 and 2 in 36-Hole Final.

LOSER FALTERS AT CLOSE

Three Down After 18 Holes, He Fights Back to Even Terms, but Fails in Last Effort.

CHICAGO, July 26 (AP).—Johnny Lehman of Chicago won the Western Amateur Golf Championship today by defeating his young fellow townsman, Ira Couch, 4 and 2, in the thirty-six hole final at the Beverly Country Club.

Lehman, comedalist with Chick Evans at 147 and conqueror of the 1929 champion, Don Moe of Portland, Ore., was the favorite as the final round started.

The rivals were all even at the three-quarter mark. Three down at the end of the first eighteen holes, Couch took advantage of Lehman's many errors and threw the fight into a deadlock, but Lehman came back to win.

Couch Squares Match.

Lehman won the first hole with a 5, one over par. Each was wild with second shots, but Lehman recovered nicely, while Couch took a 6. It began to rain as they teed off at the long second, but Couch shot a birdie 4 with an eight-foot putt to square the fight. Lehman got a par. Couch went 1 up by winning the short third with a par 3. Lehman's tee shot was wild.

Lehman snared a nice birdie 3 on the 365-yard fourth. Both were ten feet from the pin in two. Couch's putt stopped a foot short, and the match was square. Lehman sank a 15-foot putt for another birdie 3 on the fifth to go 1 up. Couch got a par. They halved the sixth in par 3s, making the third straight 3 for Lehman.

The rain ceased to drizzle as Lehman went 2 up by winning the long seventh with a par 5. Couch got a 6, losing a stroke when his second landed behind a tree. Couch laid Lehman a stymie on the eighth green and won the hole with a par 4, cutting Lehman's margin to 1 up. Lehman took the ninth with a par 4 and made the quarter turn 2 up. They halved only one hole, the short sixth.

Lehman Concedes Hole.

Lehman missed a one-foot putt for a half on the 173-yard tenth and Couch trimmed his lead again to 1 up. On the eleventh both were all over the fairway with hooked and shanked shots, but Couch staggered on finally with a 6, one over par, and Lehman conceded the hole to square the match for the third time. They halved the short twelfth in par.

Couch's tee shot on the 326-yard thirteenth landed beneath a hedge and he was forced to pitch out safely. His third was on and he took two putts for a 5. Lehman was on in two and holed an eight-foot putt for a birdie 3, going 1 up again. Lehman dropped a niblick shot five feet from the cup on the fourteenth, missed the putt for a birdie, but won the hole with a par 4, as Couch got too familiar with a bunker and took a 5. Couch cut his handicap to 1 down again on the fifteenth with a par 4 when Lehman sent his tee shot to the rough and made a poor approach. It was the thirteenth hole which either was won or lost.

Lehman won the 414-yard sixteenth with a par 4, to go 2 up again when Couch three-putted. Couch spilled his tee shot on the short seventeenth to a trap, muffed his out, took three more to get down in 5 and be 3 down. They halved the eighteenth with par 5s, and Lehman went to the clubhouse 3 up.

Lehman Holds Lead.

Lehman retained his 3-up lead of the morning round over Couch by halving the first three holes of the afternoon round. Couch holed out a twenty-foot putt to get a half on the short twenty-first.

Couch then won three straight holes to square the match. They halved the twenty-fifth hole with par 5s and then halved the twenty-sixth and twenty-seventh with perfect 4s to speed around the three-quarter turn all even.

Lehman shot par on the short twenty-eighth and went 1 up again when Couch three-putted from a distance of thirty feet for a 4. It was the first hole won by Lehman since the seventeenth. The twenty-ninth was squared with regulation 5s.

The thirtieth was halved in par 3, but Lehman won the next hole with a par 4 when Couch three-putted again. It was the second time on the inward round that a three-putt green cost Couch a hole. He now was 2 down.

The thirty-second was halved with par 4s. On the thirty-third Lehman played a perfect 4, while Couch's drive landed among some trees, forcing him to take a 5 and go 3 down and 3 to play.

The long fight ended on the thirty-fourth green. Lehman was on nicely in 2 while Couch sailed his approach second over the trees and down a steep bank. He chipped back to within ten feet of the cup. Lehman's putt of eighteen feet stopped eighteen inches from the cup. Couch's putt for a 4 rimmed the cup and he then conceded the match and title, 4 and 2. Lehman shot even par for the final seven holes, while Couch was four over.

CHAPMAN TRIUMPHS IN GREENWICH GOLF

Wins Leg on Curtiss Trophy by 3 and 2 Victory Over Lloyd in Final.

VOIGT LOSES IN MORNING

By LINCOLN A. WERDEN.

Special to The New York Times.

GREENWICH, Conn., July 26.—The Julian Curtiss Trophy, emblematic of victory in the Greenwich Country Club Invitation Golf Tourney, will be inscribed with the name of Richard Chapman as the result of the home club player's triumph in the final round today over Larry Lloyd, also of Greenwich, 3 and 2.

Chapman, the 19-year-old youth who captured the Interscholastic Tourney over the Greenwich course earlier in the season, is one of the youngest players to win the invitation event that was captured by George Voigt last year.

No little surprise resulted this morning when Voigt was eleminated from the tournament by Lloyd, who required only a single putt on nine greens and twenty putts during the entire round. Lloyd conquered the Walker Cup star, 5 and 4.

Lloyd's Putter Falters.

Against Chapman, however, Lloyd was less successful on the greens and, in fact, he lost the last hole by three-putting and the previous one by failing to get down in two from the edge.

After he had won the sixth with a par 4 to square his match with Lloyd, Chapman faltered on the seventh, where his pitch landed in a bunker, but he again evened the play by holing a ten-footer for a birdie 3 at the ninth and was out in 39.

A hooked drive into the woods cost Chapman the eleventh, but he won the twelfth with a 3 after driving to the green and then holed a four-footer for a birdie 4 on the next hole to become 1 up.

Chapman Wins Two Holes.

After halving the fourteenth, Dick won the next two in par figures when Lloyd's tee shot at the 199-yard fifteenth was short of the green and his second putt at the sixteenth missed the cup.

Lloyd began his uncanny streak of putting against Voigt at the fourth, where he holed a twenty-five-footer for a 4 that evened the match. Before that, however, Lloyd had given some indication of how well his putter was functioning by rolling in an eight-footer to halve the second and a twelve-footer to halve the third.

At the first hole his putter was of no assistance, as he drove out of bounds, and Voigt took the hole with a birdie 3.

Bunkered at the fifth, the Greenwich golfer sank a ten-footer for a winning 4, and after being at the left of the green with his second at the sixth he duplicated the 4 by sinking an eight-footer, to become 2 up.

A chip and a five-foot putt helped Lloyd halve the seventh in 4s, but at the eighth his streak was broken and he three-putted and lost the hole. He retaliated at the ninth by dropping a thirty-footer for a 3, to give him a 36, even par figures, to Voigt's 37.

Starting back in more conventional fashion, with two putts at the tenth for a half, Lloyd added the eleventh with a 4, as Voigt's second landed in a divot mark on the green and his first putt ran off line.

A thirty-footer for a birdie 2 at the twelfth, which left him 4 up, and a twenty-five-footer for a birdie 4 at the thirteenth placed Lloyd in a position to end the match by putting dead to the cup for a 5 at the fourteenth.

MISS BROOKS WINS FINAL IN RYE GOLF

LAST TWO HOLES DECISIVE

Special to The New York Times.

RYE, N. Y., July 26.—After leading Miss Jane Brooks of Rockland County, 1 up, with only two holes to play, Miss Frances Williams of Pottstown, Pa., the Eastern champion, scored a pair of disastrous 7s on the last two holes and lost the final of the second annual women's invitation golf tournament today over the west course of the Westchestry Country Club, 1 up.

It was not the last two holes, however, that provided the turning point of the closely contested battle. The sixteenth was the crucial hole for the 19-year-old Pennsylvania girl.

Partially stymied by a tree after a long drive, Miss Williams played a nice pitch in the direction of the green. The ball struck a high branch of the oak, however, and dropped dead, hardly twenty yards from the spot where it had been hit.

Finds Trouble in Rough.

Miss Brooks, meanwhile, overplayed the green into the rough and then flubbed her chip shot, which rolled only five feet in the heavy grass. She chipped onto the green in her next effort and rimmed the cup with a four-foot putt.

The Eastern titleholder was left with a good opportunity to make the match dormie, but, after getting on the green in 3, she was short with her approach putt, rimmed the cup with her next and finally halved the hole with a 6.

That was all the opening Miss Brooks needed. She played courageously to square the match on the seventeenth when Miss Williams played her second into the pond, and went on to take the eighteenth with three fine shots to the green, while Miss Williams was playing up through the rough.

Miss Brooks Shoots a 90.

Neither player was at her best on the round, Miss Williams taking a 92 and Miss Brooks a 90, conceding her a 7 on the fourteenth, where she picked up. On Thursday Miss Brooks had carded an 81 and both she and Miss Williams had been in the low 80s all week.

The winner had a 1-up advantage at the seventh, but Miss Williams won the eighth to be all even at the turn. Miss Brooks then captured two holes in a row, but developed a slice that cost her each of the next three holes and Miss Williams became 1 up.

Miss Brooks then staged the brilliant rally that decided the match.

Miss Williams was the first to forge to the front when she captured the second, following a hook into the rough by Miss Brooks. The Rockland County star sank an eight-footer on the third for a birdie 4 that squared the match. After both three-putted the fourth, Miss Brooks shot out of a trap to win the short fifth after Miss Williams had overplayed the green.

Following halves on the next two holes, Miss Williams dropped her first putt on the eighth to again square the match. They halved the ninth, but Miss Williams missed a three-footer to lose the tenth and dropped the eleventh when Miss Brooks was down in one putt.

The tide of battle then moved in the other direction as Miss Brooks sliced her drive on the twelfth and dubbed a brassie shot while Miss Williams sent two straight woods to the edge of the green. The match was squared on the next hole when Miss Brooks overshot the green and took three putts.

The Rockland County player lost the fourteenth when her third shot disappeared into a tin can that was hidden in the rough and she conceded the hole.

The cards and men's par for the course:

Out—
Par	4	4	5	4	3	4	3	4	5—36
Miss Brooks	4	6	4	6	4	5	4	5	6—44
Miss Williams	4	5	5	6	5	5	4	4	6—44

Miss Brooks	4	4	5	6	.	4	4	4	6—
Miss Williams	5	5	4	3	5	4	6	7	7—48—92

Miss Brooks wins, 1 up.

Special to The New York Times.

RYE, N. Y., July 26.—One of golf's freak plays occurred in the final match between Miss Jane Brooks and Miss Frances Williams in the women's invitation tournament at the Westchester Country Club today, won by Miss Brooks.

On the fourteenth Miss Brooks drove her third shot into the rough to the right. Arriving at the spot where her ball had disappeared, she found that it had lodged in a tin can which lay on its side. She had the alternative of hitting the can in the hope of dislodging the ball or of penalizing herself two strokes for an unplayable lie. But since Miss Williams was on the green in three strokes, Miss Brooks picked up her ball and conceded the hole.

PAIRINGS ARE SET FOR L. I. OPEN GOLF

Strong Field of 148 Will Start Play on Tuesday Over the Engineers Course.

MAC SMITH WILL COMPETE

Defending Champion and Sarazen, Runner-Up, to Play—Perkins Also After Crown.

One hundred and forty-eight entries have been received for the ninth annual open championship of the Long Island Golf Association, to be held this week, according to the list of pairings and starting times released today. The number holds a strong indication that a new record will be established since post entries are expected to bring the total to about 175.

The championship will be played on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday at the Engineers Country Club. As an appetizer for the tournament, an amateur-professional best-ball medal play event will be held tomorrow.

The play during the first two days of the championship will be at eighteen holes, while on Thursday the fifty golfers who have the lowest scores and those that are tied for the fiftieth place will play thirty-six holes for the title.

Stars in the Field.

Prominent among the entrants are Macdonald Smith and Gene Sarazen, winner and runner-up, respectively, last year. It is generally predicted by golf followers that unless some upset occurs the two again will be found battling for honors when the tournament reaches its final stages.

Smith has drawn as playing partners George Voigt, the victor in 1928, and George Heron, the trio being scheduled to tee off at 2:06 P. M. The pairings and starting times for the entire field will remain unchanged on Wednesday, but new pairings will be made Wednesday night for the final day's competition.

Gene Sarazen will make an early start on the first two days, being due to begin at 9:48 with James B. Law of Cherry Valley and Walter Kozak of North Hills.

Perkins in the List.

One of the newcomers in the championship is T. Philip Perkins, former British amateur champion, who now represents the Lido Country Club. Perkins was halted in his quest of the Western amateur crown last Friday by Johnny Lehman in the semi-final round at Chicago, but he rates a strong contender in the Long Island event.

$45,000 Arlington Handicap Is Captured by Pigeon Hole With Curate Second

PIGEON HOLE WINS $45,000 HANDICAP

THE NUT FINISHES NEXT

CHICAGO, July 26 (AP).—Racing through mud fetlock deep, Pigeon Hole, 5-year-old son of Hollister—Pigeon Pie, won the $45,000 Arlington Handicap, second richest stake of the Arlington meeting, today, beating Curate in a stunning upset by a length. The Nut was third and Paul Bunyan fourth in a field of eleven.

The surprising winner, owned by Hal Price Headley of Lexington, Ky., raced the mile and a quarter in 2:07 3-5, the best performance of his career.

The stake netted Owner Headley $34,400. The effort of Curate, owned by Joseph E. Widener of New York, was worth $6,000, with $3,000 going to The Nut and $1,500 to Paul Bunyan.

Pigeon Hole, an outsider in the wagering, due to the heavy play on Sun Beau, the heavily played favorite, paid $23.47 to win, $8.80 to place and $6.86 to show. The place price on Curate was $5.56 and $4.76 to show. The Nut, another long-shot, paid $9.62 to show.

With no particularly great stars in the field, possibly excepting Sun Beau, the field of seventeen originally named was reduced to eleven at post time, due to the sloppy condition of the track.

The big disappointment of the race was the performance of Sun Beau, owned by William Sharpe Kilmer of Binghamton, N. Y. Sun Beau, shouldering top weight of 125 pounds, did not extend himself in the muddy racing and was trailing most of the way, finishing last.

The race had its tragedy, too, when Toro, owned by E. B. McLean, Washington newspaper publisher, one of the greatest race horses in the country, broke down completely after running half a mile. He limped so badly that Jockey Ambrose had to dismount on the back stretch and the 5-year-old horse, which finished third in the Kentucky Derby two years ago, could not even walk.

He was taken to the barn in a wagon and first reports were that he had suffered a broken leg. Such a breakdown would have resulted in his death, but later it was learned that only ligaments were torn, a recurrence of his breakdown after finishing third in the Arlington Cup a week ago.

Repentance, Ridden by Kelsay, Taking Wakefield Handicap.

By BRYAN FIELD.

up by his tired and beaten stablemate. He closed ground in the stretch and finished second, but there never was any chance of getting to Questionnaire.

Repentance Earns $3,700.

Gifford A. Cochran's Repentance, which previously had been beaten by narrow margins in two Empire City races, scored decisively in the Wakefield Handicap, the secondary feature, which was worth $3,700 to the winner.

Only two were to run in the Wakefield when the first comers reached the track, as Mr. Cochran had scratched Time Enough, leaving Repentance and Mrs. R. T. Wilson's Greatorex to run alone. Later in the day, Highly and Noble Sir were added to the field to run as an entry. They did not affect the betting very much and Repentance went to the post a 1-to-2 favorite. Mrs. Wilson's horse was 16 to 5 and the entry was 5 to 1.

At the end of the five and a half furlongs, the horses finished just as the betting indicated they would. Repentance won very easily by five lengths and Greatorex was two lengths before Noble Sir, with Highly a distant trailer. The time of 1:07 1-5 was two seconds slower than the track record.

The first 50-to-1 winner of the metropolitan season scored in the first race, when King's Charmer led six other claiming horses.

King's Charmer won by only a length and a half, but was going away so fast that Drawing Board, the 8-to-5 favorite, was a soundly beaten horse. Half a length further back came Bramabiau. Stephanite, Beau Wrack, Valour II and Athel also ran. Athel is the horse that won at 1 to 2 on Thursday.

$2 Mutuels Paid—Pigeon Hole, $23.74, $8.80, $6.86; Curate, $5.56, $4.74; The Nut, $9.62.

Scratched—Jean Valjean, Brown Wisdom, Easter Stockings, Hot Toddy, Plucky Play and High Foot.

Pigeon Hole began fast, improved his position steadily, moved up strongly entering the stretch, challenged Curate strongly and, despite being carried wide by the latter on the turn, wore him down in a hard final drive and won drawing clear. Curate made a fast move around the first turn, causing much crowding. He soon wore down Lady Broadcast and assumed command when straightened out in the backstretch, continuing well to the final furlong, but tired. The Nut closed a big gap from a slow beginning, finished gamely, but hung in the final drive. Paul Bunyan made up a little ground, but could never threaten the leader. My Dandy had speed to the stretch turn. Lady Broadcast quit after the first half mile. Sun Beau seemed to dislike the going and was never a strong factor. Toro had to be pulled up and dismounted after the first quarter when he broke down.

King's Charmer trailed far back for the first seven furlongs, came around the field on the stretch turn, went wide and, closing with a rush, won going away. Drawing Board was well up from the start and ran a game race. Bramabiau followed the early pace closely and held on gamely. Stephanite broke fast, dropped back on the turn, but came again in the stretch. Beau Wrack was used up racing in front and quit fast when caught. Athel and Valour II were both outrun.

Sanford broke very slowly on the extreme outside, trailed far back of the leaders to the far turn, where he moved up on the outside, circled the field and, closing gamely, won going away. John Cavanagh displayed plenty of early speed, set a fast pace and held on gamely. Windfall was never far from the pace and finished gamely. Syrell lacked early speed. Bird of Prey saved ground all the way, but weakened badly after showing early speed.

Questionnaire was much the best. He set the pace under restraint and opened up a gap in the final quarter-mile, to win in a gallop. Gone Away trailed the field for a mile. He closed with good speed. Spinach was well up with the pace, but tired in the final furlong. Awake showed good early speed, but trailed off after reaching the stretch.

DON LEON CAPTURES CINCINNATI TROPHY

Easily Wins $5,000 Added Event and Cup in Field of 14 Starters at Latonia.

ELYSIUM FINISHES SECOND

Whitney Entry Fails in Late Effort—Cousin Joe Takes Third Money.

LATONIA, Ky., July 26 (AP).—Don Leon, chestnut colt, by Lee O. Cotner—Water Willow, the property of R. W. Collins, captured the twenty-ninth running of the Cincinnati Trophy, an event worth $5,000 added and a silver loving cup.

H. P. Whitney's Elysium was second and Cousin Joe, from Charles Nickols's barn, came in for third money, while J. N. Camden's Frigate Bird saved his entrance fee.

Bill Hamilton got the field of fourteen off in good alignment. Don Leon was the first to show, with Elysium close up and Cousin Joe running in third place. They finished in that order.

McCrossen, who rode the winner, just eased his mount along and was galloping easily at the end. Elysium made a weak effort in the last sixteenth, but could not menace the winner. The victor earned $7,540 for his owner and ran the six furlongs in 1:14 flat.

SARATOGA RACES BEGIN WEDNESDAY

Stars of the Turf Are Ready for Meeting in Which $500,000 Will Be Distributed.

GALLANT FOX IS ENTERED

By BRYAN FIELD.

With scores of racing strings and hundreds of horses already on the ground, the Saratoga meeting will begin on Wednesday with the Flash Stakes and Saratoga Handicap as the two features of the opening day program. Each is a $5,000 race. By the end of the five weeks of racing in excess of $500,000 will have been distributed to horsemen. In all, thirty-nine stakes will be contested with the Hopeful, run on the closing day, the richest. It will gross close to $60,000.

Since the Civil War Saratoga has been a meeting ground of the great horses from all sections of the country—from Kentucky, from the West and from time to time from foreign countries. This year it is likely to see the best in every division, and unless an accident develops, Gallant Fox, the 3-year-old champion, will make one or more appearances.

Equipoise, rated at present the best of the juveniles, has had a long rest in preparation for the meeting. However, he is not eligible for the Hopeful.

Unknown Juveniles to Run.

A glance at the list of eligibles for the important juvenile tests discloses names which are as yet unknown to many turf followers. Before the end of the Saratoga meeting a few of these names may be known far and wide as first flight or even champion 2-year-olds.

Gallant Fox may become far more than the 3-year-old champion before the end of the meeting, as he is eligible for the Saratoga Cup, where he will be meeting older horses. It is the intention of William Woodward, his owner, and Trainer Jim Fitzsimmons to point the colt for the Travers and the Cup, and if he should come through victorious he will have a claim as king of the handicap division as well as best among the horses of his own age.

The great son of Sir Gallahad III—Marguerite will be well engaged at Saratoga, being eligible for six stakes. They are the Wilson, Saranac, Whitney, Miller, Travers and Cup. It is possible that he may have a tuneup in one of the lesser races in preparation for the Travers, where he again is expected to meet Harry Payne Whitney's Whichone.

Gallant Fox Has Won $274,000.

Should Gallant Fox win his starts in the Travers and Cup, Saratoga will have another distinction, for those purses will have made Gallant Fox the greatest money-winning horse on the American turf. To date he has won in excess of $274,000, with the winner's share of the Travers purse being about $35,000 and perhaps $10,000 more in the Cup. Zev, present American leader, has won a few hundred dollars in excess of $313,000 and has been retired for years.

The mishap which caused the retirement of Blue Larkspur probably removes Gallant Fox's greatest obstacle. The champion 3-year-old of 1929, Blue Larkspur this year was a smashing winner in the Arlington Cup race and looked to be in such condition that he would have pressed Gallant Fox.

U. S. SADDLE TITLE TO LADY MARGARET

PETER THE GREAT SCORES

Captures Jumping Stake in Close Competition—Touch-and-Out Final to Blue Fern.

By HENRY R. ILSLEY.

Special to The New York Times.

STAMFORD, Conn., July 26.—Lady Margaret, the beautiful chestnut mare owned by the Polka Dot Farm of H. M. Gallup of Scarborough-on-Hudson, N. Y., was crowned the grand national saddle horse champion of America in the most important event of the thirteenth annual Stamford horse show, which closed today.

A brilliant gathering of show enthusiasts and society leaders from all parts of the East joined in the demonstration that greeted the winner. Second place went to Likely Lady, the chestnut mare from the stable of Mr. and Mrs. Harold Palmer of Grosse Point, Mich.

Only Four in Ring.

A field of nineteen had been nominated for the event, but after five days of competition the owners of only four deemed that they had a chance. The other two were the Boxwood Farm's chestnut gelding Mountain Redbut and Edwin C. Feigenspan's chestnut mare Prudence.

Championship honors in the small division of the saddle horses went to the chestnut mare, Mello Glo, owned by G. Berry Beaumont, reserve ribbon going to the Green Hill Farm's gray gelding, Silver Dare.

In the division over 15 and not over 15.2 hands the championship ribbon was pinned on the bridle of the chestnut mare, Likely Lady, the star of the stable of Mr. and Mrs. Harold Palmer. The Polka Dot Farm's chestnut mare, Lady Mildred, went out with the reserve ribbon.

The Polka Dot Farm monopolized the championship for saddle horses over 15.2 hands, taking the title with Lady Margaret and reserve with the chestnut gelding, Whoopee.

$500 Stake to Howard Entry.

Two brilliant events closed the jumping competition. The $500 jumper stake brought out one of the largest fields of the week, and after a jump-off the blue went to the great performer Peter the Great, the big chestnut gelding owned and jumped by Minot Howard of Port Chester, N. Y.

Last of all came the final of the touch-and-out stake, the placed horses in the previous events being eligible. Two jump-offs were necessary to decide the moneys.

First was captured by H. Hollon Crowell of Boston with the gray gelding, Blue Fern, ably jumped by Danny Shea. Second was Miss Ivy D. Maddison's bay mare, Vada Belle, with owner up.

Peter Manning, 14 Years Old, Trots Year's Third Fastest Mile

Special to The New York Times.

HANOVER, Pa., July 26.—Peter Manning, 1:56¾ champion of the trotting world, again lowered the record for 14-year-olds, when he trotted an exhibition mile in 2:02¾ today over the mile track at the Hanover Shoe Farm. Despite the high temperature and the fact that his regular pace setter gave out before the three quarter pole was reached, Peter Manning went the third fastest trotted mile this season.

The best time was 2:02, made by Hanover's Bertha at Cleveland two weeks ago. Driven by Lawrence B. Sheppard, Peter trotted first quarter in 0:31⅓, the half in 1:01½, three quarters in 1:32¾.

ENGLAND GETS 221 FOR FIVE WICKETS

Receives Setback After Fine Opening of First Innings Against Australia.

TOURISTS' TOTAL IS 345

Add 70 Runs to Overnight Score as Fairfax and Grimmett Star in Cricket Test.

MANCHESTER, England, July 26 (AP).—England's cricket test match team, playing against Australia at Old Trafford, will spend the week-end doing a lot of worrying. At the end of today's play it had made only 221 runs in reply to Australia's first-innings total of 345 and had lost five good wickets.

After making a fine gesture in the opening phase, England suffered an amazing turn of fortune. At the tea interval the team had lost only three wickets for 136 runs.

Jack Hobbs and Herbert Sutcliffe opened the English effort with another century for the first wicket, the eleventh against Australian bowling. Then the wickets of Hobbs, Sutcliffe and Wally Hammond were captured in quick succession and a favorable position was turned into an ominous situation. These three players were got rid of for an addition of only 11 runs.

Australia Adds 70 Runs.

Australia this morning, through spirited batting by A. Fairfax and Clarence Grimmett, had added 70 runs to its overnight score for 345 before the side was retired.

With the runs coming steadily, Sutcliffe provided a brilliant spot in a sequence of singles and twos by hitting a full toss from A. Fairfax into the crowd. Don Bradman, the Australian star, tried hard to make the catch. Hobbs sent up the century on a single off Hornibrook. At this stage he had scored 29, while Sutcliffe had made 62. Extras accounted for the balance.

The English total was 108 when Hammond came in. Sutcliffe hooked a full toss from T. Wall into the crowd on the side of the field. He tried to drop another for six. Bradman ran under it, stumbling among the crowd and made a brilliant catch, afterward falling. There was doubt whether the ball had gone over the boundary and the umpire signaled that Sutcliffe was out. It was an unlucky dismissal, as the stroke was the most brilliant Sutcliffe had made in his innings of 74. The second wicket fell at 115.

Innings Total Reaches 136.

Prince Duleepsinhji and Maurice Leyland came together and a critical moment was passed. Duleepsinhji began to hit out and off Hornibrook got a two and two fours in succession by pulls and a hit through the slips. Leyland got off the mark by gliding Wall for a single. Grimmett came back for a short time before tea, at which time Duleepsinhji had scored 18 and Leyland 1, the innings total being 136 for three wickets.

England got going again when Duleepsinhji and Leyland settled down. The former sent up the 150 by steering Wall down the gully to the boundary. In the same over he found a gap at point for a two. He then jumped in to Grimmett and hit him for four twice.

The score went to 170 when Grimmett and Hornibrook took up the bowling. Duleepsinhji pulled Hornibrook for four and staged a worthy stroke, getting a boundary off Fairfax on a leg drive. Duleepsinhji hit weakly into the slips and was caught by Hornibrook off McCabe's bowling. He scored 54 and left when England's total was 192.

Chapman Scores Five.

Chapman stone-walled and evidently intended to try to play out time. He was called on to "hit 'em up a bit," but did not at first respond. He could not resist a ball from Hornibrook which was wide of the wicket. He played a fatal stroke and was caught by Grimmett low down at point. He scored five.

Leyland sent up the 200 in partnership with M. Tate. The Australians tried hard to get another wicket and the bowlers were changed repeatedly. Tate was lucky when a snick of his went past fine leg to the boundary. The two were together when stumps were drawn, Leyland having made 35.

JOLIETTE, Que., July 26 (AP).—Edouard Fabre, Montreal, and Ollie Wanttinen, Finland, won the seventh lap of the 500-mile marathon relay race today, covering the sixty-six miles from Three Rivers to Joliette in 7 hours 55 minutes 10 seconds.

Their victory placed the two runners within three minutes and twenty seconds of second place in the elapsed time for the seven days. Joie Ray of Chicago and Johnny Salo, Passaic, N. J., retained second position, despite the fact that they finished fifth today.

Far out in front in elapsed time are Arthur Newton, South Africa, and Peter Gavuzzi of Southampton, England, who finished second in today's run. Newton and Gavuzzi lead Ray and Salo by two hours and sixteen minutes, with the race due to end tomorrow at the Montreal baseball park.

Meadow Brook Poloists Lose to Roslyn Team by 12 to 9 at Whitney Field

ROSLYN TEAM BEATS MEADOW BROOK FOUR

MILLS BACK IN LINE-UP

Returns After Fortnight's Absence and Helps Losers to Almost Tie Score in Second Half.

By ROBERT F. KELLEY.

Special to The New York Times.

WESTBURY, L. I., July 26.—A Roslyn team, after taking a long lead through the opening chukker, just managed to stave off the late-period rally of a Meadow Brook team to take this afternoon's Meadow Brook exhibition, 12—9.

The game, played on the new Whitney Field, was slow and spotty through most of the opening periods but increased to an exciting pace during the last three sessions as the blue-shirted Meadow Brook riders sped up their game.

Stephen Sanford, Harold E. Talbott, Stewart Iglehart and J. C. Rathborne rode in that order for the Roslyn team, each of the men being a candidate for the new American team for the British series.

Cowdin Figures in Rally.

Meadow Brook had Elbridge Gerry and James Mills of Old Aiken, the latter returning to play after an absence of two weeks with a huge pad protecting his left knee; Averell Harriman and J. Cheever Cowdin. Cowdin, who is to retire from the game next month, figured prominently in some of the late period play of the losing side.

The red-shirted Roslyn riders had things pretty much their own way through the first four periods. They were going well as a team and Rathborne and Iglehart were hitting very nicely in the backfield and keeping play turned into rival territory.

They piled up a big margin and just failed to make a runaway of the game, the Meadow Brook team clinging to them and managing to keep the score as low as 8 to 4 at half time. There was a good deal of missing and scrambled playing on both sides through the opening periods, but the game turned for the better in the second half.

The Meadow Brooks were picking up. Mills, after his enforced lay-off, was not hitting very well in the early play, but he gained confidence toward the end and his return to something of his old form had a good deal to do with the improved showing of the losers.

Losers Brace in Seventh.

Even with a better defense, the Meadow Brook side was never able to overhaul its rivals and Roslyn kept a safe margin through the sixth period. The winners were leading at the close of this period by a 10 to 6 score and the game, apparently, was over.

But Meadow Brook took a decided brace in the seventh. With Cowdin hitting a bit harder and managing to turn more Roslyn attacks, play swung the other way with a vengeance. Cowdin sent a pass to Gerry that made it 10 to 7; then Mills had a nice goal and Cowdin, storming into things, let go with a long, accurate drive that pulled his side up within one goal of the leaders.

For a while the Blues continued to press. Sanford crossed in an effort to stop a Blue attack, but Cowdin's try for the free hit was blocked. Then the Roslyn team attacked, but at the bell Gerry came very close to tying the score on a beautiful near-side drive that was just a trifle short and was knocked clear as the period ended.

Roslyn Returns to Attack.

Roslyn returned to the attack with the start of the final period, however, and a long run by Sanford up the boards, which Talbott very nearly finished off into a goal, brought play back into Meadow Brook territory and a few moments later Sanford had turned a Cowdin hit-in for Talbott to ride to for the goal which put Roslyn out of danger again. Then, with the last bell ringing, Iglehart added the twelfth goal.

The line-up:

1—S. Sanford.	1—E. T. Gerry.
3—S. B. Iglehart.	3—W. A. Harriman.

By VERNON VAN NESS.

contests Lieutenant Jones seemed to stand out above the others.

Today, however, it was the highly efficient team work and intricately designed passing game that brought victory, each of the four men riding as a unit of the combination and no one performing individual feats that did not have some direct relation to team work.

On the offense it was Jones and Wilkinson who rode to the front to make the major portion of the goals, but it was Rodes and Lieutenant Homer Kiefer who paved the way for many of these and who, on defense, stood stanchly before the Whippany River attacks.

Defensively, Kiefer stood out as the man of the hour. Times without number, when Whippany River slashes came tearing for the goal, Kiefer was there to turn the ball aside, or would ride on to the ball as the Whippany Riders were advancing to attack, steal it and drive it to the boards and turn the tide.

Walter Lindrum, the Australian champion, received as many as seventeen certificates for world's records made on his recent visit to England, one of which was his break of 3,262 made against Willie Smith, former English professional champion, last December. L. Steeple's break of 354 in the amateur title tournament also has been recognized as a record.

FISSLER IS VICTOR IN SENIOR SWIM

George Fissler of the New York A. C. and Miss Mary Hagen of the Women's S. A. of New York were the winners of Metropolitan A. A. U. senior aquatic championships, which featured a water carnival conducted over a 55-yard course in the pool at Columbia Park, North Bergen, N. J., yesterday.

Fissler scored an unexpected victory in the 330-yard medley title test, for which Leonard Spence, his clubmate, stood favorite. The latter secured a five-yard lead in the breast stroke swim, but in the following back stroke trial Fissler cut down the margin to three yards and in the final free style sprint he overtook and passed Spence, gaining the verdict by two yards in 4:28 2-5. Paul Gallagher and Philip Harburger, both of the Brooklyn Central Y. M. C. A., were the only other contenders. Gallagher finished third, nearly thirty yards behind Spence.

Miss Hagen won easily the senior crown in fancy diving from the ten-foot springboard. She received an average of 118.6 points, while Miss Ellen Ubart of the People's Palace, Jersey City, was second with 101.1 points and Miss Frances Hanlan of the Women's S. A. took third with 98.8 points.

PENN A. C. OARSMEN LEAVE FOR BELGIUM

The Penn A. C. senior eight-oared crew sailed with its coach, Frank Muller, yesterday aboard the Belgenland for the international regatta to be held at Liege, Belgium, Aug. 15-17.

One of the prized possessions of the crew when it boarded the ship was the cedar shell, which will be used in the regatta. The members of the crew carried the shell up the gangplank themselves and stored it safely away on the well deck.

During the trip across the party will keep in condition by the use of four rowing machines rigged up on the deck. Each member of the crew, as well as the substitute, Pete McGovern, is a sculler as well as a sweepswinger, so the crew can be split into six events if desired—senior single sculls, association single sculls, senior double sculls, senior pair-oared shell, senior four-oared shell and the senior eight.

In the party were Charles McIlvaine, bow; Thomas A. Curran, No. 2; John C. Bratten, No. 3; John W. McNichol, No. 4; Myrlin B. Janes, No. 5; Captain Joseph M. Dougherty, No. 6; Daniel H. BUSY TIME AHEAD FOR DOG FANCIERS

LENOX EXHIBITION AUG. 16

By HENRY R. ILSLEY.

Bench show activities will be resumed in the East next month, and they will continue almost without interruption until the snow flies. There will be a vacation during the holidays; then will follow the indoor specialty shows, which will lead to the usual hectic days of February. First of the late Summer shows will be in New England, starting with that of the Berkshire Kennel Club at North Adams, Mass., on Aug. 9.

Entries will close next Saturday for the annual exhibition of the Lenox Horse and Dog Show Association, which will be held on the Hanna estate, at Lenox, Mass., on Saturday, Aug. 16. Miss Elizabeth L. Godwin, president of the association, is also chairman of the bench show committee.

Several of the members of the board of judges have been drawn from the metropolitan district. George A. Flammer of Roseland, N. J., will have the pointers and setters and many of the breeds in the hound division of the sporting dogs. Andrew Albright Jr. of Newark will be the all-around judge and award best in show. George C. Wecher of Hawthorne, N. J., will pass upon sporting spaniels.

From Albany Wyatt T. Mayer will go over to judge Airedale, Irish and smooth fox terriers, bull terriers and whippets. Mrs. A. W. Ocorr of Pittsford, N. Y., has been given most of the toys, while William H. Schwinger of Ebenezer, N. Y., will take the collies. Wire-haired fox terriers and Welsh terriers will be passed upon by Henry J. Cookingham Jr. of Utica. German shepherd dogs have been assigned to Paul J. Ewald of Cataumet, Mass., and Mrs. M. M. Van Beuren of Newport, R. I., will take the Pekingese and pugs.

No one who attended the last exhibition of the Eastern Dog Club, held in the Boston Garden, will forget for a long time the sheep-herding competition held in the great arena, nor the unrestrained enthusiasm of the vast assemblage attracted by the event. The Garden was packed to its capacity, thousands attending who knew little of dogs and dog shows.

So immediate was the success of this initial venture that it was predicted that eventually there would be sectional competitions in all parts of the country where sheep raising is carried on extensively, with a final championship in which all the sectional winners would compete.

Announcement is now made by the Eastern States Exposition of Springfield, Mass., that it is going through with the championship competition, which will be held in the Exposition Coliseum on Friday afternoon, Sept. 19. Former champions of Scotland and sheep-herding dogs bred in this country will compete for trophies and cash prizes offered by the Eastern States Exposition and the New England Sheep and Wool Growers' Association, which is cooperating in the competition.

Each dog and owner will go through the same set of competitive events and sheep will be driven and penned, as at the Boston exhibition. Peter C. McKenzie of State College, Pa., will judge the event and James C. Watson of Brandon, Vt., will be superintendent of the trials.

Increase in the sheep-raising industry in the Eastern States in recent years has resulted in the breeding and training of some remarkable sheep dogs. Outdoor trials have been held annually at Bennington, Vt., but the scope of these will be enlarged in the first indoor championship trials.

Seeks Entries From All Parts.

An interesting plan is being worked out by the bench show committee in charge of the national specialty show of the Shepherd Dog Club of America, which this Autumn is to be held at Belmont Park. Efforts are to be made to secure entries from the local clubs in all parts of the country and to this end dogs will be taken in charge by a special committee, which will see that all dogs from any local club will be benched together.

To assure exhibitors sending their dogs from long distances that they will be looked after with the greatest care, these groups will be housed together at the many local kennels in this section of the country. Many of the members of the Long Island Shepherd Dog Club, under whose auspices the show will be held, have engaged to take care of a few dogs each in their homes. Thus far-away fanciers will be assured that their pets will receive every attention, will be properly housed, fed and shown during their stay here and will be returned home in the best of condition.

RENTAL CONDITIONS BRIGHT FOR WEST SIDE APARTMENTS

EVENTS OF THE WEEK IN THE REALTY FIELD

Emigrant Bank Paid $275 a Square Foot for Small 43d Street Plot.

TWO BIG MIDTOWN DEALS

Trading and Building Projects Reveal More Activity—Suburban Conditions Improve.

Slightly more activity characterized the realty market last week than during the preceding period. In addition, plans for several large buildings were filed and projects announced for others in the near future. Several good suburban deals were closed, showing that, despite the general quietude in out-of-town property, there is a steady demand with indications of improved conditions in the Fall.

The midtown Manhattan area furnished two of the outstanding transactions, involving a Sixth Avenue block front and a large plot in the old Chelsea region, both acquired by operators with confidence in future values and activity in that part of the city. George E. Coleman bought the easterly Sixth Avenue block front between Twenty-fifth and Twenty-sixth Streets, occupied by fourteen old houses, and which, with his adjoining holdings, gives him a plot of 42,000 square feet. Just to the west, a syndicate headed by Horace Kiple bought a plot fronting 151 feet at 245-259 West Twenty-fifth Street, between Seventh and Eighth Avenues.

Banks Adds to Holdings.

The purchase at auction of the 17 ly 100-foot plot at 12 East Forty-third Street by the Emigrant Industrial Savings Bank for the high price of $467,000 revived the rumor that the bank was preparing to erect a large building in the Grand Central area, occupying a portion for its uptown offices. The bank purchased some time ago the Transit Building at 5-7 East Forty-second Street with the annex on Forty-third Street, and with its recent purchase owns a plot of 60 feet on Forty-second Street and 6-14 East Forty-third Street, fronting 97 feet.

The price paid for 12 East Forty-third Street parcel averages $275 a square foot, and is said to be the highest price for inside lots in the Grand Central Zone outside of Forty-second Street properties. No immediate building plans are contemplated by the bank, but it was announced before the close of the year.

Other transactions of interest included the purchase by Michael E. Paterno of a plot at the northeast corner of Park Avenue and Seventy-first Street for a cooperative apartment house, the purchase by Benjamin Winter of the thirteen-story apartment structure at the northeast corner of West End Avenue and Ninety-sixth Street, which he had previously owned, and the sale of the building and eighty-four-year leasehold at 872 Madison Avenue, northwest corner of Seventy-first Street.

Among the important transfers recorded was that of the easterly section of the Stern department store, 130 feet on both Forty-second and Forty-third Streets, from the Schulte interests to the General Realty and Utilities Corporation. It was transferred subject to mortgages of $3,850,000. Stern Brothers hold a renewal option for twenty years on the existing lease expiring in 1933.

Plans were filed for another lower Wall Street edifice, a twenty-four-story structure at the southwest corner of Front and Wall Streets to cost $700,000, and also for a sixteen-story apartment at 317-21 East Fiftieth Street, in the Beekman Hill area, to cost $600,000.

Of interest in the suburban market was the sale at Dobbs Ferry of the Broadway Arms apartment on Broadway and Cedar Street, containing suites for thirty-seven families, to a Yonkers syndicate.

The loaning market continued steady. The New York Title and Mortgage Company announced the placing of loans during the week aggregating $3,386,050 on properties in the metropolitan area, and a loan of $800,000 was placed on the new sixteen-story apartment, 12-2 West Ninety-sixth Strete, for the M. W. & H. L. Hall Company.

One of the largest steel contracts awarded in some time was made by the Chanin Construction Company for approximately 7,000 tons of structural steel for the twenty-nine-story Majestic apartment house going up on the old Majestic Hotel site, Central Park West, between Seventy-first and Seventy-second Streets.

Acquires Garden City House.

Henry S. Chardavoyne, president of the H. S. Chardavoyne Milk Corporation of Brooklyn, has bought for occupancy a brick residence of Georgian type at 69 Brook Street, Garden City, L. I. The structure, which is on a plot 75 by 156 feet, contains te nrooms and three baths. Mr. Chardavoyne is retiring from active business. George W. Clough arranged the sale for Joseph Boyle through multiple listing.

TALLER APARTMENTS IN WEST SIDE AREA

Fifteen High-Class Houses Will Be Ready for Occupancy This Season.

FIVE FACE CENTRAL PARK

Tower Buildings There Present New and Imposing Architectural Features.

Rental conditions on the west side in the newer as well as in the older houses have been very satisfactory this season. Brokers generally report that for about a month or six weeks prior to July 1 the rental situation was fully as active as in any previous year. Since that time leasing for Fall occupancy has been quiet, but a revival of activity is confidently looked for early in September, at which time the majority of the new houses will be better adapted for personal inspection than was the case in June.

As has been the custom on the east side for the last few years, so on the west side, in the newer houses, it is becoming quite the rule to rent suites from the plans. For instance, in the San Remo, whose two towers, viewed from a distance, are pleasingly suggestive of the old-time minarets of some foreign cities, several of the largest and highest priced suites were rented before the end of the Winter season, one being a large apartment for Nathan Straus, whose fine private home in Seventy-second Street near the park was torn down only a short time ago.

According to the agents in charge of the new houses, by Oct. 1 they will all be rented to the extent of 75 per cent or better, some already being close to the 75 per cent mark. There are not so many new houses to rent this season as was the case at the same period last year. This has been beneficial in many ways, as it has helped the rental situation in all types of good houses.

As a matter of fact, the west side, all the way from the upper Sixties to 110th Street, contains so many comfortable apartments, equipped with the latest conveniences and wisely kept in the best possible condition, that there is no special urge to move to a new house. All of the leading agents report that renewals of existing leases have been very large.

Fifteen Tall Apartments.

The present season will witness the opening on the west side from Sixty-sixth to 108th Street of fifteen tall multi-family homes, practically all constructed under the new multiple-dwellings law. One-third of these will face the park on Central Park West. Three of these occupy entire block fronts, being 101 Central Park West, between Seventieth and Seventy-first Streets, built by the Bricken Construction Corporation; the San Remo, between Seventy-fourth and Seventy-fifth Streets, built by the H. R. H. Construction Company, and the El Dorado, between Ninetieth and Ninety-first Streets, built by the Elkay Builders Corporation.

The other two are, respectively, at 55 Central Park West, south corner of Sixty-sixth Street, and 444 Central Park West, south corner of 104th Street. Earle & Calhoun are the builders of the former as well as the agents, the house taking in all of the block front except the Sixty-fifth Street corner, occupied by the Holy Trinity Lutheran Church. The 104th Street house is built by the Frymier & Hanna Company, Slawson & Hobbs being the agents. Pease & Elliman are the agents for the Bricken apartment and L. J. Phillips & Co. are the agents for the two big tower apartments, the San Remo and the El Dorado.

Two of the new apartments, each sixteen stories in height, are on Amsterdam Avenue, being, respectively, at the southeast corner of Seventy-ninth Street and the southwest corner of 108th Street. One is on Broadway, the Trafalgar Towers, northeast corner of Ninety-ninth Street; one on Riverside Drive, on the north corner of Seventy-seventh Street, known as 50 Riverside Drive, covering half a block frontage; and another tall edifice is nearing completion on the southwest corner of Manhattan Avenue and 106th Street.

New Architectural Treatment.

Five of the fifteen new houses are on side streets. They are 49 West Seventy-second Street, just opened for occupancy; 15 West Eighty-first Street, running through to Eighty-second Street; a large sixteen-story edifice, separated by an eleven-story apartment house from the large Beresford, completed last year, on the block between Eighty-first and Eighty-second Streets; 32 West Ninety-second Street, 10 West Ninety-sixth Street, a large sixteen-story house adjoining the sixteen-story Presbyterian church-apartment house on the Central Park West corner and the sixteen-story house nearing completion at 123-33 West Ninety-sixth Street, fronting 100 feet, near Broadway.

The benefits of the multiple-dwellings act in respect to fine residential dwellings are being clearly demonstrated this year, both in architectural style and the addition of many terraced or setback apartments, giving the latter many of the conveniences of the penthouse apartment. This new type of apartment building is especially noticeable this season on Central Park West, where every one of the five new multi-family home structures reveals very distinctly the marked difference in apartment architecture from that which prevailed in the older houses.

Central Park West seems destined, within a few years to present distinct and imposing architectural characteristics, superior, perhaps, to any other long thoroughfare. Builders have been fortunate in getting large plots, many being entire block fronts, and architects have been enabled to do something worth while where they have the cooperation of the builders, and in virtually all of the newer Central Park West houses this desire to combine reasonable architectural charm with utility is apparent.

The lofty towers of the San Remo and El Dorado apartments, rising high over the park area and clearly observable from long distances, provide an object lesson of the new architectural treatment there. With the completion of the new Majestic apartments, on the old Majestic Hotel site, now under way by the Chanin Brothers, this effect will be still further heightened. Some of the newer buildings on upper Fifth Avenue show something of the tower effects, but for the most part that thoroughfare above Fifty-ninth Street, and also Park Avenue, present little architectural charm in apartment house development of recent years.

The ability to assemble larger plots on the westerly Central Park frontage has given the builders there, combined with the new law, advantages in making their buildings not only solidly imposing but pleasingly attractive to look upon. While many of our tall and expensive apartment structures reveal very little, if any, outward charm, something different seems to mark the future destiny of Central Park West. With its attractive setting it is evidently assured of becoming an avenue of which New Yorkers may justly be proud.

MRS. TROLLOPE FOUND WEST SIDE BEAUTIFUL

It may be interesting to present west side dwellers, as illustrative of the charm of that section as a residential abode, to note that Mrs. Trollope in her severely criticized volume of nearly 100 years ago, singled out the west side for one of her few laudatory comments on things as she saw them in America. After speaking of the many attractive villas and mansions bordering the North and East Rivers, she said: "Among them, perhaps the loveliest is one situated in the beautiful village of Bloomingdale; here within the space of sixteen acres, almost every variety of garden scenery may be found. To describe its diversity of hill and dale, of wood and lawn, of rock and river, would be in vain; nor can I convey an idea of it by comparison for I never saw anything like it. How far the elegant hospitality which reigns there may influence my impressions I know not, but assuredly, no spot I have ever seen dwells more freshly in my memory nor did I ever find myself in a circle more calculated to give delight in meeting and regret at parting."

Mrs. Trollope had particular reference to one of the fine old country estates overlooking the Hudson River near 104th Street. The year of her praiseworthy remarks on the residential beauties of the west side was 1832 when all the charm of rural life amid picturesque surroundings was at its best on the west side river front, heightened, as she suggests, by old-fashioned genuine hospitality. She was the mother of the popular novelist, Anthony Trollope.

BUILDING REVIVAL PREDICTED BY FALL

LABOR SITUATION TRANQUIL

Meeting in Atlantic City Tomorrow to Discuss Adjustment Tribunal Plan.

A survey of building conditions in many of the leading centres of the United States and Canada indicates, according to E. M. Craig, executive secretary of the National Association of Building Trades Employes, that the depression of the last few months is gradually subsiding, with evidences of a gradual revival of construction work in the Fall.

He adds that reports from builders reveal that tranquil labor conditions are prevalent; wage scales are stabilized, with ah absence of any concentrated effort on the part of labor to procure a five-day work week. Before the present decline of building there was considerable agitation for the establishment of the forty-hour week. In several of the large American cities, he points out, builders report that the present volume of construction for this present year promises to exceed the 1929 building volume.

"There will be an important joint meeting of builders and building trades leaders at Atlantic City tomorrow," states Mr. Craig, "where the provisions for a new tribunal to adjust jurisdictional disputes between building trades will be discussed and probably ratified.

Plan Adjustment Tribunal.

"President Hoover has urged the establishment of an adjustment tribunal, pointing out that such a board would be the means of procuring the confidence of the public in the national building industry."

According to Mr. Craig's survey, builders in New York report that their program lags far behind that of 1929, but with sufficient work in homes and in the large industrial types to keep resident building tradesmen employed.

Chicago builders predict that the second six months' period of the year will see a revival of construction. To date it is estimated that fully 75,000 of Chicago's 115,000 building artisans and laborers are unemployed.

One of the most active building programs is in Cleveland, where a large quantity of work has been let and there has been but a small decrease in the volume of construction for the first six months of 1930 as compared with 1929.

In Baltimore the construction valuation for the first five months of 1930 shows an increase of almost $2,000,000 over the first five months' volume of 1929.

Reports from Louisville show a 123 per cent increase for the first six months of this year as compared with the same perod in 1929. This is largely due to contracts aggregating $10,000,000 for new sewage work.

Staten Island Parcels Auctioned.

Several realty parcels in Delafield Avenue and Clove Road, West New Brighton, S. I., were sold for the estate of Henrietta Winegar last Wednesday at an auction conducted by Cornelius G. Kolff, Inc. The auctioneer reports that the upset price was exceeded in each case. The buyers were John Danker, R. D'Allesandro, a Mrs. Cokefair and a Mr. Cohen.

GARDEN SUITES ON BAPTIST HOME PLOT

INTERESTING DEAL FOR SITE

Property Sold for $1,000,000 Was Leased by City in 1870 for $1 Per Year.

Construction work has just been started by John D. Rockefeller Jr. on two ten-story and penthouse apartment residences to occupy the old site of the Baptist Home for the Aged in the middle of the block bounded by Park and Lexington Avenues, Sixty-seventh and Sixty-eighth Streets. The property was purchased by Mr. Rockefeller Jr. early in 1929 for about $1,000,000, including $197,000 advanced to the home to enable it to purchase the property from the city, held under a ninety-nine-year lease dating from 1870 at $1 a year.

The plot now being improved is known as 111-119 East Sixty-seventh Street and 112-120 East Sixty-eighth Street, fronting 125 feet on each street. On the adjoining Park Avenue frontage is a ten-story apartment on the old Hahnemann Hospital site, while the remainder of the block, including the Lexington Avenue frontage, is occupied by the Institute for the Instruction of Deaf Mutes.

The site of the new apartments is part of the former Hamilton Square tract which was leased to various charitable, educational and other institutions at nominal rents by the city. This site was leased at $1 a year for ninety-nine years in 1870 to the Ladies Home Society of the Baptist Churches of the City of New York, now known as the Baptist Home for the Aged.

The Baptist Home in 1919 secured an enabling act from the Legislature permitting it to purchase the property. By the same act, the Baptist Home was authorized to dispose of the property upon condition that the proceeds be devoted to new buildings on the same site or to the purchase of a new site within the city for a new home.

The city finally sold the property to the home for $197,000 in September, 1928, with the understanding that it was to be sold to the Empire Mortgage Company for the erection of apartments. From a business standpoint, it was pointed out, the sale by the city was an excellent one, as under the old lease, which had forty-one years to run, the city would have received no taxes. The $197,000 invested by the city at 4 per cent for forty-one years would amount to $983,629, practically equivalent to the $1,000,000 which was the agreed present value of the property.

Large Interior Garden.

The two new apartments will contain some exceptional features in addition to a large interior garden. The architect is Andrew J. Thomas, who has designed several of the model tenements and other structures erected by Mr. Rockefeller in different parts of the city. The general plan provides that the houses will occupy only 65.8 per cent of the ground space. The remaining 34.2 per cent will be transformed into an Italian garden, affording a large open space for sunlight and fresh air.

An interesting feature, which, it is said, will be introduced for the first time in New York in these apartments, is provision for a separate laundry in each apartment with a window to the outer air and separated from the apartment by a metal and glass partition.

Each building will have a depth of about 80 feet. The interior garden will be approximately 125 feet by 40 feet, with two additional wings, 24 feet by 38 feet. The garden will be attractively landscaped with shrubbery, grass plots, bluestone flagging and fountains. Opening into the garden from the rear of each building will be an arched loggia, separated from the main lobby by a glazed metal grille.

The houses will contain fifty-four apartments, including two penthouses and four doctor's suites. The penthouses will have eleven rooms and outside terraces. Apartments on the ninth floor will also have outside terraces.

The first and second floors of each building will contain a ten-room maisonette and doctor's offices. Above the second floor will be simplex and duplex apartments, the former ranging from five to eleven rooms and the duplexes averaging eight rooms. Plans have been made so that the duplexes can be increased to nine or ten rooms if required.

Dr. Flexner a Tenant.

One special duplex apartment of thirteen rooms has been leased to Dr. Simon Flexner. All rooms will be of large size, the living rooms being equipped with wood-burning fireplaces. The kitchens will have tile wainscoting and tile to the ceiling at the ranges. Bathrooms will be finished with faience tile and built-in accessories.

The design of the façades is in modernized Romanesque, the lower stories being faced with buff and light brown sandstone. Steam heat will be furnished by the New York Steam Company, but space has been provided to permit installation of boilers and storage of fuel if desired.

The sale of the property by the Baptist Home to the Empire Mortgage Company for $1,000,000 and improvements now under way will bring the total investment to approximately $2,000,000. If the premises are assessed, it is pointed out, at $1,500,000, the taxes at $2.75 per $100 of assessed valuation will amount to $41,250 a year. Adding this to the interest on the cash vale value of $197,000, the city will receive $49,130 a year for the greater part of the term under the old lease in exchange for its previous annual rental of $1.

For its new home the Baptist Home for the Aged purchased last year a tract of twenty lots in the Riverdale section of the Bronx, fronting on Fairfield and Arlington Avenues, Spuyten Duyvil Parkway and 235th Street.

ACTIVE FEATURES OF CITY AND SUBURBAN REALTY MARKET

LOAN MONEY IS PLENTIFUL

Survey of Fifty-six Cities Shows Investment Capital Ample for Non-Speculative Dwellings.

"There is a billion dollars available for home building at the present moment in forty-six cities in the United States and plenty of land to build on," said Joseph P. Day yesterday discussing the prospects of the real estate market in the metropolitan area.

"There is an old saying about opportunity knocking once in a lifetime. Today opportunity is knocking at the door of every individual that owns a building lot, and there are thousands of them, and every one that aspires to own and occupy a home.

Funds for Building.

"Money is cheap and property is cheap, a combination that should result in the biggest home-building boom that New York and its environs has ever witnessed if the opportunity is only grasped by even a small percentage of those seeking a roof they can call their own and a few feet of garden space in the suburbs.

"At the recent real estate convention held in Toronto, Canada, Herbert U. Nelson, executive secretary of the National Association of Real Estate Boards, told the association directors assembled there that there is nearly a billion dollars 'praying' to be borrowed for non-speculative home construction and ready to be passed out over the counters in forty-six cities in the United States.

"Supplementing this statement Mr. Nelson said: 'People who have been saying that money is tight in the United States just haven't been around to their brokers lately, for if they want it for sound building projects they probably will be ushered right into the president's private office.

" 'Because the association felt that resumption of building asked by President Hoover had been delayed due to a "timidity" on the part of the public to ask for construction loans, a survey on what is actually available in forty-six widely separated cities was completed by the association a week ago.

"The survey, which is supported by documentary evidence from individual banks and mortgage houses, revealed that $843,712,000 can be loaned 'at once' in these forty-six cities for non-speculative building.

"Of this amount Mr. Nelson's figures showed that there was available in Westchester $4,285,000 and $145,000,000 in Brooklyn, without considering the amounts available in Manhattan savings banks and loaning institutions.

"According to a survey completed this month by the Brooklyn Real Estate Board there is at present at least $145,000,000 available in Brooklyn for conservative real estate loans, not counting outside sources of funds which the organization believes would bring the total amount to more than double that figure. The estimate is based on reports from twenty-eight lending institutions in Brooklyn, but does not include life insurance firms and others outside of Brooklyn or funds available from private sources. The survey included title and mortgage companies, banks, savings and loan firms and trust companies.

Loan Associations.

"All these facts and figures spell opportunity for the prospective home builder and buyer. In addition to these references there are numerous building and loan associations ready and willing to finance the thousands of lot owners in and about Greater New York.

"Many people are not aware of the advantages of these associations which loan money at $10 per month per thousand. Half of the $10 goes to pay off the principal and the other half to interest, so that at the end of several years one owns his property free and clear. Today there is an unprecedented opportunity to buy and build.

"The demand today for homes goes to two extremes, the small home that can be purchased for about $8,000 and the home that will cost $80,000 or $100,000.

"The higher priced homes are numerous but those in the class under $10,000 and especially those about $8,000 find ready buyers throughout the metropolitan zone.

"The real estate market at the present time is only marking time; conditions are improving daily and by Fall it should strike its old pace again.

"There is an old adage among real estate men that when the stock market is down real estate is up. The market has had its day and realty is beginning to feel the influx of capital that has been diverted from the stock market."

HOTEL CENTURY CHANGES.

College Fraternity Leases Penthouse Quarters.

The Vernon Hotel Corporation, which recently purchased the lease of the Hotel Century at 111 West Forty-sixth Street, east of Broadway, has renovated the hotel and has appointed Fred P. Mallin as directing manager.

The corporation has leased to the Metropolitan Graduate Club of the Phi Sigma Delta Fraternity the penthouse on the seventeenth floor of the hotel for a period of years. The national headquarters of the fraternity will also be at the Hotel Century.

Riverside Drive Extension.

Borough President Bruckner of the Bronx has prepared maps showing an extension of Riverside Drive up to Mount St. Vincent and then to turn in an easterly direction to connect up with the Saw Mill River Parkway. If this plan is approved, an increase of $100,000,000 in realty values in this section is predicted with a large apartment-house development.

Williamsburg Trolley Plans.

Materials required for repairs and improvements at Williamsburg Bridge for the resumption of trolley service are being manufactured and will be delivered probably late in August. Prospective patrons of the lower east side are urging the opening of the service early in the Fall.

COMMENDS COOLIDGE ON HOME BUILDING

Home Owners Institute Thinks It Will Lead to Greater Activity.

Residential construction has received a helpful impetus from former President Calvin Coolidge, points out the Home Owners Institute of America in calling attention to his recent statement urging home building at this time when "the price of most building materials has reached a low level."

"The conservative and well expressed thoughts of Calvin Coolidge in suggesting that present conditions are favorable for home building," says Fenton B. Turck Jr., chairman of the National Building Survey Conference, "is a heartening message to many of those whose perspective has been blurred through the rapid change in economic and business conditions for the past year.

"This is not Mr. Collidge's first expression on home building and home ownership. The subject is one which has always been close to his heart. Nor was this statement made without careful consideration and study of existing conditions.

"Moreover, while he mentions that building material costs are low, Mr. Coolidge does not predicate his advice entirely upon that fact. He bases it principally upon the sound economic foundation for more homes and better homes in this country. His greatest appeal, therefore, will be to the thousands whose attitude toward home building will be governed as much by confidence in the business situation as by the costs of materials.

"After a speculative era which always marks a departure from home interest and environment, we are now in a period when the home and its environment again comes into its proper place in our thoughts."

Mr. Coolidge is a member of the advisory council of Better Homes in America, of which Herbert Hoover as Secretary of Commerce under Mr. Coolidge organized and still heads. Mr. Coolidge in endorsing the movement at that time declared:

"I have been much impressed during the past three years with a widespread interest and cooperation in the educational movement for better homes in America. The home has been and ever must be a source of profound influence and inspiration in the lives of all citizens. It plays the chief rôle in the development of the children of our nation for stability and uprightness. To raise the standards of the American home, is, therefore, a substantial contribution to national well-being."

EAST SIDE EXPECTS CITY PLAN BENEFITS

First Avenue Association Sees Early Changes Under the Proposed System.

Benefits will accrue promptly to the rapidly growing east side of Manhattan under the projected City Planning Commission, in the opinion of Clarke G. Dailey, chairman of the First Avenue Association's planning committee. The Board of Alderman has approved the commission plan.

The east side will adapt itself more readily to the work of city planners than more thickly populated and heavily built up areas such as Broadway and the downtown business section, says Mr. Dailey, who looks for widespread changes in the character of the district between Twenty-third and Ninety-sixth Streets, close to First and Second Avenues.

"No part of Manhattan is changing so rapidly as the east side," Mr. Dailey states, "and we must prepare for the future with a view to the vast modern developments which are scheduled by the various interests holding property in this territory. Unless the east side, which promises to be a garden home spot of Manhattan with the new East River Drive to be built, looks far ahead, it ultimately will face the same building and traffic congestion which makes city planning in other parts of Manhattan a very difficult task.

"Millions will be invested in the most modern buildings in the east side area, and these must be located and constructed for the city that Manhattan will be fifty years hence. We cannot be too far-sighted in plans for the future east side, and because of the character of its buildings this district lends itself well to the first steps of city planning."

ELMHURST SURVEYED.

Good Rental Record for Homes and Apartments.

Few apartments and private homes are reported vacant in an occupancy survey covering a large part of Elmhurst, Borough of Queens, according to Louis H. Woodburn and George C. Johnston Jr. for the Long Island Real Estate Board.

In the area bounded by Baxter Avenue on the north, Gleane Street on the east, Maurice Avenue on the south and Broadway on the west, there are 328 one-family houses with one vacancy reported; 337 two-family houses with seventeen vacancies; 1,008 apartments in other than two-family houses with sixty vacancies; 114 stores with twenty-nine vacancies. The number of vacancies in the stores is attributed to the fact that a large number are taxpayers.

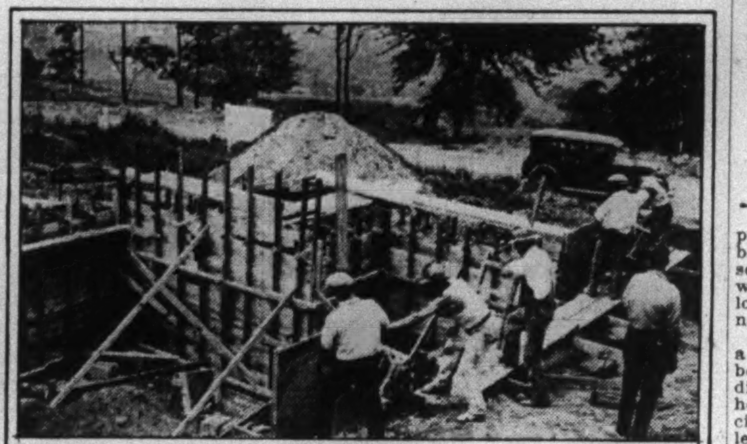
In the area bounded by Maurice Avenue on the north, Toledo Street on the east, Queens Boulevard on the south and Broadway on the west, there are 193 one-family houses with one vacancy; 175 two-family houses with nine vacancies; fourteen apartments in other than two-family houses, all occupied, and twenty stores with one vacancy.

In the area bounded by Roosevelt Avenue on the north, Ninety-fourth Street on the east, Queens Boulevard on the south and Ninety-second Street on the west, there are 328 one-family houses with one vacancy; 156 two-family houses with no vacancies; seventeen buildings with three or more families with a total of 192 apartments with the following vacancies: Six three-room apartments; six four-room apartments; six five-room apartments; four six-room apartments.

Re-elect National Board Officials.

All officers and members of the Executive Committees of the Divisions included in the National Association of Real Estate Boards, groups representing specialized phases of real estate practice, executive secretaries of local real estate boards and property owners enrolled in the Property Owners' Division, were elected for 1931 at the recent Toronto convention of the association. The new division heads will be inducted into office at the association's midwinter meeting next January.

BUILDING MASTER MODEL HOMES IN MANY LOCATIONS



By Having All Forms in Place Before Pouring Commenced, So That the Entire Foundation Was Poured in One Operation, a Monolithic Concrete Foundation Was Achieved in the Master Model Home Being Constructed at Orchard Hill, Westchester County.

A Completed Slate Roof and Steel Casement Windows Set Into Place Mark the Progress on the Orchard Hill Master Model Home Being Constructed by Mutual Builders of Orchard Hill and Sponsored by Home Owners Institute.

High praise for the quality construction shown in the five master model homes sponsored by Home Owners Institute of America in the metropolitan area was voiced by Charles F. Le Viness, Westchester County building inspector, following a visit last week to the demonstration home being constructed at Orchard Hill by the Mutual Builders of Orchard Hill.

Mr. Le Viness commented particularly upon the procedure followed in the concrete work, by which the entire foundation was poured in one day, setting as a single unit with monolithic effect and strength. All the master model homes are being built from designs which won prizes in the $29,000 National Better Homes Architectural Competition last Fall.

"The concrete work on the foundation of the master model home at Orchard Hill is of a quality second to none in all the territory under jurisdiction," Mr. Le Viness said.

Progress on this Westchester County home is seen in the slate roof which has been completed this week. Portions around dormer windows and chimneys are flashed with sixteen-ounce copper to insure full protection against roof leakage.

Steel casement windows are in place. The chimney in which the incinerator combustion chamber is set is now through the roof and the main chimney is well up above the first floor level.

Workmen are setting in brick around the entrance door using the clinker common brick to obtain a range of rich color. In the finished house this portion will contrast with light colored stucco laid upon metal lath.

On Monday of the past week the electrician had put in the last boxes for the full wiring of the house which is being done according to a nationally famous system of electric wiring.

A slate roof now completed also marks the high point in the week's construction work at the Nassau Shores (L. I.) master model home being constructed by the Harmon Housing Corporation from the prize-winning design of Roi L. Morin, architect of Portland, Ore.

Insulating board sheathing is on and the brick veneer which forms the first floor walls is rapidly piling up toward completion under skillful bricklayers' hands.

The master model home at Cheelcroft, Ho-Ho-Kus, N. J., which is being constructed from the prize-winning design of Royal Barry Wills, Boston architect, showed particular activity during the past week on the landscaping features which are to be so important to the home-owner who eventually occupies this house.

The brick walks laid in a bed of buff-colored cement are now finished. Carpenters are at work on the cedar hurdle fence which surrounds the entire plot. A pool at the rear end of the garden is completed and will soon be surrounded by evergreens.

Slate flagging for the bridge court where the family may foregather on warm afternoons is in place. A picturesque trellis has also been set in preparation for the climbing roses which will eventually cover it.

A foundation of heavy stone for the drive to the two-car garage was put in last week. Within the house plasterers have completed their work and left the walls to dry out before interior decorating is started. Interior trim work is going forward.

An efficiency kitchen, complete in all its details, has reached its final stage in the Cheelcroft house. A specially constructed monel metal sink has been installed under the broad double windows overlooking the rear garden. Flanking this on each side are handsome cabinet units for dishes and cutlery, the combination utilizing the entire wall space on that side.

Along the opposite wall, near the entrance, is placed an electric refrigerator, the mechanism of which is hermetically sealed in a chamber on top, while a storage cabinet for provisions, pots and pans is placed between the refrigerator and a handsomely enameled, cabinet-type range, with a movable hood which can be lowered to cover the burners when not in use.

The kitchen at one end opens into a breakfast nook with table and benches which fold between the studding and behind French doors. The hopper door to the chimney-fed incinerator is located in a passage way leading to the basement stairs, where another cabinet for brooms and other cleaning equipment also has been placed.

With the finishing equipment and final touches going into the Stewart Manor (Long Island) Master Model Home in preparation for its opening on Aug. 17, James Graham, vice president of Realty Associates, builders of this house, drew attention to the speedy construction which has marked this operation.

Delays Prove Costly.

"Delays on any home building job under the supervision of Realty Associates have proved costly not only to this organization but to the home buyer, and construction work is never allowed to lag on our properties," he explained.

"We believe that one of the reasons that we are able to show satisfactory activity in promoting home building today during a low market is that we do not permit losses through procrastination. No one can estimate how much money would be lost if we allowed even a few of our jobs to drag along. Consistent pushing forward is a principle with us which is splendidly exemplified by the rapidity with which work has gone forward on the Master Model Home at Stewart Manor."

Such expediting of construction as Mr. Graham explains promises a fully completed house ready for the many visitors who will seek it on its opening day, Aug. 17.

Sleepy Hollow Manor Model Homes.

In that same country where Washington Irving wandered, visualizing the Ichabod Crane who was later to become so famous in his story of the headless horseman, a master model home is soon to be constructed. This house, like all others now building in the New York area under the sponsorship of Home Owners Institute of America, is a prize-winning design of the 1929 National Better Homes Architectural Competition conducted by the institute with entries from all parts of the United States.

Charles H. Robinson, general manager of Sleepy Hollow Manor, a Henry Mandel home development on a historic site, believes that the grand prize winner designed by H. Roy Kelley, A. I. A., of California, finds a particularly fitting setting under its great oaks. The design is reminiscent of the architecture of California and the Southwest, which was the territory opened up by General John C. Frémont, former owner of Sleepy Hollow Manor, pathfinder of the Southwest.

"The house, which was the centre of his great estate overlooking the Hudson at this point, was built by General Webb and purchased from him by General Frémont. It was during General Webb's occupancy that Washington Irving was a frequent visitor, with freedom to roam at will under the trees which still enhance this residential property. When General Webb left his Sleepy Hollow home to go to Brazil as United States Minister, he sold the estate to his friend.

PLANNING TO BUILD WORTH ST. SUBWAY

Transportation Board Officials Getting Sanction of Property Owners.

DELANEY OUTLINES ROUTE

New East Side Link Will Connect With Other Rapid Transit Lines Near Church Street.

Representatives of the Board of Transportation are engaged in the work of getting written consent of property owners on the proposed subway route along Worth Street, East Broadway and Grand Street, from Church Street to Lewis Street, a project approved by the Board of Estimate last month.

Chairman J. H. Delaney of the Transportation Board has written to about 450 owners of real estate outlining the plan for the new subway link and urging their cooperation to facilitate construction. The East Side Chamber of Commerce and other organizations have requested property owners to give their consent at once and the signatures of more than 50 per cent of these owners will be received within about two weeks, it is believed.

Mr. Delaney's letter read in part as follows:

"This route, lying wholly within the Borough of Manhattan, will begin at a point under private property in the easterly line of Church Street at or near the northeasterly corner of Church Street and Leonard Street where a connection can conveniently be made with other proposed rapid transit railroads; thence curving southeasterly across private property, Leonard Street, private property, Worth Street and Broadway to a point under Worth Street at or near Broadway; thence extending southeasterly along Worth Street to Chatham Square; thence extending easterly across Chatham Square to East Broadway; thence continuing easterly along East Broadway to Grand Street; thence extending southeasterly along Grand Street to Lewis Street where a connection can conveniently be made with other proposed rapid transit railroads. The route is to have two tracks throughout.

"Before actual work can be begun on the construction of this route one more step is necessary to effect its validation. It is the statutory duty of this board to secure consents from the owners of abutting property representing not less than 50 per cent of the assessed value abutting on each thoroughfare traversed by the route.

"Failure of an abutting property owner to give consent is equivalent to opposition to the route and failure to give consent on the part of the owners of more than 50 per cent of the assessed value on any one street or zone traversed by the route may cause either the abandonment of the route or make necessary appeal to the courts with attendant delays of long duration. Either alternative should be avoided as any further delay in determining the location of rapid transit routes in this section of the Borough of Manhattan will unavoidably result in confusion and uncertainty as to the plan and development of this section of the borough.

"The Board of Transportation by this communication and by its canvassers is not asking you to surrender any right you may have to compensation for any damage you may sustain by reason of the construction of this subway, nor is it asking you to convey any right of way through your property. You will note that such rights are specifically protected in the form of consent presented to you. The taking by the city of New York of certain real property for right of way for this route is unavoidable. The acquisition of this property will probably be through the usual means of condemnation."

NINE BRONX PARCELS IN AUCTION OFFERING

On Tuesday, in the Bronx salesroom, he will sell 1,352 Findlay Avenue, two-story brick building, plot 26 by 98 feet; and the vacant lot 25 by 100 feet on the east side of Olinville Avenue, 285 feet north of Gun Hill Road.

On Wednesday, in the Bronx salesroom, he will offer 1,683 Washington Avenue, a four-story brick building, plot 25 by 90 feet; 3,063 Heath Avenue, a two-story frame and a one-story brick building, plot 50 by 87 feet; and 811 Penfield Street, a two-story brick building, plot 25 by 100 feet.

On Thursday, will be sold 771 Grote Street, a four-story brick building, plot 28 by 116 feet; and two vacant lots, each about 25 by 60 feet, on the south side of Greystone Avenue, west of Waldo Avenue.

On Friday, the sales include 753-757 East 224th Street, three seven-family brick houses, plot 75 by 114 feet, and vacant plots 50 by 90 feet each on the Bronx Boulevard, running through to Bullard Avenue, 100 feet west of East 240th Street.

NASSAU COUNTY GROWTH.

Visitor Surprised at Improvements Within Three Years.

Nassau County is not only the fastest growing county in New York State, but also in the entire metropolitan area, points out M. J. Brady, treasurer of Brady, Cryan & Colleran. He predicts a period of even greater growth in the near future.

"We who are on Long Island perhaps do not appreciate the growth of Nassau County as much as those who look in on the county from time to time," said Mr. Brady. "I have in mind the case of a friend who had not seen Nassau county since 1927. The development that has taken place along the South Shore since that time amazed him. We drove along the new Southern State Parkway, the new Sunrise Highway, and detoured to Merrick Road, and he was surprised to see how the localities had grown. When we came to Wantagh and were halted to permit cross traffic on the Jones Beach Causeway he was again surprised at the work there and at Jones Beach. Three years ago he had no idea such a project would materialize."

BUILDING MATERIAL ON NEW FIRE RATING

Six Classifications Provided to Simplify Work of Underwriters.

CLASSIFICATIONS DEFINED

Many Manufactured Products Will Be Tested as to Fire-Resistive Qualities.

A new system of fire retardant classification of building materials designed to provide a simple and more practical basis for treatment of such materials by underwriting and building officials in inspections and ratings has been adopted by Underwriters' Laboratories, under the auspices of the National Board of Fire Underwriters.

"Some confusion heretofore has existed from a lack of such a general classification and from emphasis on small differences in fire test performances which are of only slight practical significance," the organization reports.

The new plan lists six definite classifications. The highest class includes building materials resisting the standard fire test for eight hours or over. The other classes are graded at five to eight hours, three to five hours, two to three hours, one to two hours and the lowest grading is given materials of only slightly fire resistive character, ranging from one hour down to ten minutes.

No notice is taken of fractions of an hour in any class. Material showing a resistance of seven hours is given a five-hour rating under the five to eight hour classification. If it falls below five hours it takes the three hour rating in the three to five hour group. In the lowest class, however, sub-classifications at ten-minute intervals will be included in the Laboratories' published records.

When requested by manufacturers of the materials in question, follow-up inspection service will be established. In the case of hollow clay tile specifications for this material, based on the specifications of units on which fire test results are already available, a suitable follow-up inspection program will be instituted. As other masonry materials and other types and forms of such materials are classified as a result of fire tests they will be included in their respective classes.

Manufacturers' listings of materials and assemblies, such as acoustic finishes, asbestos boards, cork boards and wired glass, at present listed as standard but not classified as to fire retardant value in terms of time, will be included in Underwriters' Laboratories' published records.

The fire retardant classifications will include: 8 and 12 inch walls and partitions of hollow concrete building units; 8 and 12 inch walls and partitions of hollow clay tile; 4, 8 and 12 inch walls and partitions of common clay brick; 3-inch partitions of gypsum blocks; twenty-six building columns and column protections; metal lath-gypsum plaster partitions and interior finishes; wood lath-lime plaster partitions and interior finishes; wood lath-gypsum plaster partitions and interior finishes; plasterboard partitions and finishes; metal lath and plaster ceiling finishes; metal lath and plaster on wood joisted floor constructions.

As additional materials and assemblies are tested and classified they will also be included in their respective classes.

EXTEND SAFETY PLAN IN TOWN OF RADBURN

Builders to Construct Pedestrian Parkway and New Bridge Over Highway.

Extension of the pedestrian safety program, which is one of the features of the town of Radburn, N. J., is planned by the City Housing Corporation, the builders.

To enable pedestrians to pass safely between the north and south sections of the town a foot bridge will be constructed over Fair Lawn Avenue, the county highway and main traffic artery. The project has been approved by the Bergen County Board of Freeholders.

Concrete footways at each end of the bridge will connect it with the park walk system on the north and a new pedestrian parkway about to be opened south of Fair Lawn Avenue. The new park provides the footways and play area for a group of forty-eight terrace homes of an English type now under construction. Like the earlier Radburn groups the new houses will have one entrance on a closed-end motor street and another on a garden lane leading into the park footways. The proposed bridge will make it possible for children living in the new section to walk in safety to the Radburn school in one of the north parks.

For outdoor sports such as swimming, the residents of the new district will not need to leave their own neighborhood, as an open air swimming pool similar to that now in operation in the north block has been authorized for the park south of Fair Lawn Avenue. Construction will be started this Fall.

SOUTHAMPTON AUCTION.

Major Kennelly to Sell Home Plots Next Month.

Fifteen residential plots at Southampton, L. I., will be sold at auction Saturday afternoon, Aug. 16, on the premises, by Major William Kennelly. Each plot measures about 74 by 262 feet in area, or approximately half an acre.

The plots are located in a historic section of Southampton, at Halsey's Neck Lane and Ox Pasture Road, in the Summer estates colony.

Reduce Rockaways' Assessment.

The Board of Aldermen has approved a local law relieving the property owners of the Rockaways from 85 per cent of the cost of regulating, grading and improving Beach Channel Drive, Hammels Boulevard and Amstel Boulevard at a total cost of about $3,000,000. Instead of a 100 per cent assessment on the local area, the proportion is to be 60 per cent on the city, 25 per cent on the Borough of Queens and 15 per cent on the local area.

Houston Street Subway Work.

More than 33 per cent of the work on the Houston-Essex Street subway link from Sixth Avenue to Broome Street has been completed, according to the Corson Construction Corporation. More than 800 men are employed daily on the job.

ABSORBING NEW SPACE NEAR GRAND CENTRAL

Cushman Predicts 90 Per Cent Office Occupancy Record by May 1, 1931.

Commercial structures which have been completed this year in the Grand Central zone will be at least 90 per cent occupied by May 1, 1931, in the opinion of J. Clydesdale Cushman, president of Cushman & Wakefield, who bases his prediction in part on the absence of unusual building activity at present in that section.

Only three major competitive office projects are under way in the territory east of Sixth Avenue between Thirty-eighth and Fiftieth Streets, Mr. Cushman points out. These will be finished by next May, to add about 1,000,000 square feet of rental space.

"The five most important office buildings completed this year in the district are the Chrysler, Lincoln, News, Lefcourt Colonial and 370 Lexington Avenue," he says. "The percentage of space leased to date in these structures warrants my forecast of a 90 per cent occupancy by next May. In 370 Lexington Avenue, for example, about 70 per cent of the space is rented, although the building was opened only two months ago.

"In addition there will be the fifty-eight-story building being erected at 500 Fifth Avenue, with a rental area of 493,000 square feet; the forty-one-story commercial operation at the southeast corner of Madison Avenue and Fortieth Street, about 250,000 square feet, and the thirty-five-story office building at the northwest corner of Forty-fourth Street and Third Avenue, with approximately 296,000 square feet. These three projects, I understand, are to be finished before May of next year.

"Many of the older buildings in the Grand Central zone have lost tenants to the newer buildings in the past year of from one to five floors, but I expect this space to be filled, after renovation or alterations are completed, to bring it to a competitive basis with the new neighbors. Incidentally, all of the five floors that were vacated in the Pershing Square Building by the International Paper Company this year were taken over by the Travelers' Insurance Company, so I feel that the older buildings that have lost tenants will, within the next twelve months, have most of that empty space absorbed.

"Taking ten of the largest of our older office buildings, we find, from our July 1 survey that they average 95 per cent rented. When it is considered that the accepted practice is to allow 10 per cent for vacancies, the present condition of such buildings is far from indicating cause for alarm.

"As the radio, automobiles and aviation fields have, in recent years, absorbed so much business space in New York, and so much more has been taken by companies whose research departments have brought forth new chemicals and compounds, so in the future the supply of new inventions to satisfy wants created by those commodities will tend to fill not only the older buildings but those recently completed.

"Office space is still being absorbed at a rate which, coupled with the reduced construction activity in and around the Grand Central zone, presages the more rapidly filling of properties between now and April 30, 1931, than there has been in the past when 3,000,000 square feet of office space was placed on the market at one time for occupancy, last May."

MORE HOTELS COMING.

Survey Shows Steady Increase in Manhattan and Brooklyn.

According to the Hotel Association of New York City, there are twenty-six hotel operations either under way or scheduled for completion before the end of next year in Manhattan and Brooklyn. Of this number the latest under construction in the Times Square district is the Hotel Edison in Forty-sixth Street between Broadway and Eighth Avenue. With the completion of these twenty-six hostelries, there will be, it is stated, in the two boroughs, 331 hotels with an aggregate of 123,607 rooms.

Milton J. Kramer, vice president of the Milnag Realty Corporation, owner of the Hotel Edison, said that this situation had been carefully studied by his father, Max J. Kramer.

The Hotel Association's survey also shows that during the past three years sixteen hotels, having 4,836 rooms, have been demolished, while eighty-four new hostelries were erected, with a total of 39,636 rooms, a net addition of 34,800 rooms since January, 1927.

MOUNTAIN LAKES SALES.

Belhall Properties Valued at $60,000 Change Hands.

Five sales, including two homes, two houses to be built to order and one waterfront plot, in the Belhall development at Mountain Lakes, N. J., were reported yesterday. Their aggregate value was about $60,000.

The purchasers were George B. Finneran of Summit, who is erecting a Colonial home from plans by Dudley St. Clair Donnelly; W. B. Scheckel of Brooklyn, who bought a dwelling on Kenilworth Road; Mr. and Mrs. Dwight E. Tutter of East Orange, who will build; Harry S. Dennis, a home on Hanover Road, through Myrtle L. Hillman, and George L. McCall of Montclair, home site on Glen Road.

SELL EAST LYME HOMES.

Colonial Residences in Artist Colony at Auction on Saturday.

Several New England residences on the Carrington estate in East Lyme, Conn., will be sold at auction on the premises next Saturday afternoon at 3 o'clock.

The houses are designed in the manner of 1730 with modern conveniences, and each has two baths. They are situated on five-acre plots, with the Pattagansett Brook intersecting the property. The property is located in the centre of a colony of artists, playwrights and teachers. The neighborhood has been the rendezvous for many years of playwrights and in this section that a number of works of literature and songs have been written. All of the Carrington residences are on the main street of East Lyme.

Buys Montclair Residence.

The Cape Cod dwelling at 18 La Salle Road, Fieldstone, Montclair, N. J., built by the Inwood Corporation for Fox-Crest, Inc., has been sold to James J. Hennessy of this city. The house contains seven rooms and the plot is 60 by 145 feet. Mr. Hennessy also purchased the adjoining plot, 60 by 145 feet, for a garden.

ACTIVITY IS NOTED IN 23D STREET AREA

NEW BUILDINGS GOING UP

Apartment and Business Structures Being Erected—New Transit Links to Aid Section.

Purchase of the easterly Sixth Avenue block front between Twenty-fifth and Twenty-sixth Streets by George E. Coleman, announced last week, is the latest indication of renewed interest in the district centring in Twenty-third Street and is evidence that plans for a number of realty improvements are on foot, in the opinion of Louis Schrag, chairman of the real estate committee of the Twenty-third Street Association.

"Although intensive development of Sixth Avenue doubtless awaits the removal of the elevated structure, realty and building activity already is to be noted especially in the Twenty-third Street zone," Mr. Schrag says, in reviewing the number of residential buildings recently completed or planned there, particularly in the Gramercy Park section and in the area centring in the old London Terrace block where the Henry Mandel companies are erecting a group of tall apartments.

"A number of new business buildings also are going up, including the annex to the Metropolitan Life Building at Fourth Avenue and Twenty-fourth Street; a branch for the National City Bank close by on Twenty-third Street; the Strack office and loft building on Twenty-third Street near Third Avenue; another National City Bank branch at 226-28 Seventh Avenue; the Morgan Brothers' warehouse nearing completion at 522-26 West Twenty-first Street, and the Lehigh Valley terminal and warehouse on Twenty-sixth and Twenty-seventh Streets near the Hudson River waterfront.

"It is anticipated that far greater activity will be witnessed in this territory in the immediate future. It will undoubtedly be hastened by the construction of additional transportation facilities, the opening of the new Eighth Avenue subway, the completion of the East River drive and the express highway and railroad right of way on the west side. On both the east and west sides owners have added to their present holdings, indicative of their confidence in the future of Twenty-third Street. Holbrook B. Cushman recently purchased 430 West Twenty-third Street and the Peter Doelger estate acquired 204 West Twenty-third Street. On the east side the News Syndicate is now the owner of 508-16 and the Bishop Industries have purchased the plot at 403 to 407 West Twenty-third Street.

HIGH COURT VOIDS VILLAGE TAX LAW

Statute Requiring Counties to Pay and Then Collect Is Held Invalid.

TEST MADE IN ERIE COUNTY

Act Applying to Entire State Violates Constitutional Amendment of 1874.

An important tax question has been decided by the Court of Appeals in declaring unconstitutional a law passed in 1927 devising a plan by which the collection of unpaid village taxes has been shifted from village to county officers. The law, applying to all villages in the State, has been held unconstitutional on the ground that the requirement that village trustees shall transmit a certified account of unpaid village taxes to the County Treasurer, after which the county will pay them and thereafter collect them, is a violation of Section 10, Article VIII, of the State Constitution. This section says:

"No city, county, town or village shall hereafter give any money or property, or loan its money or credit to or in aid of any individual, association or corporation, or become directly or indirectly the owner of stock in or bonds of any association or corporation, nor shall any such county, city, town or village be allowed to incur any indebtedness except for county, city, town or village purposes. This section shall not prevent such county, city, town or village from making such provision for the aid and support of its poor as may be authorized by law."

The opinion, written by Judge Lehman, commenting on the method of collecting unpaid village taxes, raised in an appeal by the village of Kenmore against Erie County from a judgment dismissing the suit, says:

"Doubtless the system of levying and collecting taxes by officers of villages works imperfectly. Machinery devised for larger taxing districts than villages might function more efficiently and economically. Certainty that the village treasurer will receive the full amount of all village taxes levied is desirable for the village. To achieve that result the Legislature has commanded that the county shall obtain either through taxes or loans money sufficient to pay to the villages within its boundaries the amount of the village taxes before the taxes are fully collected, and must assume the burden of collecting the unpaid taxes and such risk as there may be that some of the taxes cannot be collected. The county of Erie, claiming that such commands exceed the power of the Legislature, has refused to accept from the village of Kenmore the account of unpaid taves levied in the year 1928 or to pay to the village the amount of such unpaid taxes.

"We are not concerned with the policy or expediency of the legislation. Subject only to the restrictions contained in the State and Federal Constitutions, the power of the Legislature is plenary. Obedience must be rendered to statutes which do not offend against such restrictions, even though they may seem to us impolitic; statutes which are beyond the power of the Legislature are invalid, though they may be politically wise. Arguments based on public policy or expediency are irrelevant, except in so far as they may guide us toward a reasonable construction of the constitutional limitations."

Judge Lehman, in referring to the provision of the Constitution alleged to have been violated by the law, says they were added to the Constitution in 1874, and stated:

"In its present form the section prohibits any indebtedness except for county, city, town and village purposes, and limits the amount of indebtedness within that field. We are concerned with the prohibition, not the limitation. The county of Erie cannot obey the legislative command without incurring an indebtedness for moneys sufficient to pay to the village of Kenmore the amount of the unpaid village taxes. The Legislature was restrained by the Constitution of the State from giving such command.

"We need not now decide whether the Legislature could have compelled the counties of the State to give from their own funds to villages the amount of unpaid village taxes, nor whether a county could be compelled to raise funds for such a purpose by taxation. We base our decision upon the express restriction of the Constitution, not upon any argument that other restrictions are implied. While section 126-d of the village law provides that the amount of taxes returned unpaid by a village shall be paid 'out of any moneys in the county treasury raised for contingent expenses or for the purpose of paying the amount of the taxes so returned unpaid,' it also provides that such amount must be paid in any event even 'if there are no moneys in the treasury applicable to such purpose.'

"Obviously, if there are no moneys in the treasury applicable to such purpose the county can make the payment only by incurring an indebtedness in the form of a loan, and there can be no doubt that the Legislature intended as a necessary part of the procedure for carrying out the provisions of the statute that such indebtedness should be incurred."

Holds Law Unconstitutional.

Concluding his opinion holding the law unconstitutional, Judge Lehman said:

"Sometimes the courts have based decisions upon the peculiar language of the Constitution, provision was more often upon an assumed necessity. A constitutional limitation upon the indebtedness of a municipal corporation should not receive a construction, it is said, which would at times render it impossible for a municipal corporation to carry out its governmental functions.

"Public policy may dictate that a limitation upon the indebtedness which may be incurred by a municipal corporation for its own purposes should not prevent the corporation from borrowing money to carry out the purposes for which it was formed until such time as it might be able to raise the money through taxation. Therefore when a limitation upon the indebtedness of a municipal corporation was inserted in Article VIII, section 10, of the Constitution, provision was made that 'this section shall not be construed to prevent the issuing of certificates of indebtedness or revenue bonds issuing in anticipation of the collection of taxes for amounts actually contained or to be contained in the taxes for the year.'

"The intent of the provision is clear, its language is unambiguous. It applies only to the limitation of indebtedness otherwise permitted; without perversion of its letter and spirit it cannot be made to apply as an exception to the earlier prohibition against a county incurring any indebtedness except for county purposes."

To acceptable families with a bona-fide intention to buy, we will lease a new home of your selection, with an option to purchase if you are happy with it—as you surely will be.

Mountain Lakes (on the Lackawanna) has been established under unified control as a restricted residential colony for over 15 years. It is no "new development." It is no summer cottage resort. It has over 2,000 residents and 80% of its family heads are New York business men who commute the year round. An active building program is under way this year, with modern homes on 100-foot frontages at prices from $12,500 up. Drive out or let us send you a booklet and details of our Rental-Purchase Plan.

BUILDERS ORGANIZE TO AID INDUSTRY

42 NATIONS TAKING PART

John W. Harris Explains Plan Adopted at London Congress for Assembling Data.

Plans to form an international organization to promote cooperation and unity in building associations and allied employers' organizations were the outstanding development of the fifth International Congress of Building and Public Works, held recently in London, according to John W. Harris of the Hegeman-Harris Company, who was a delegate to the conference.

American delegates appointed by President Hoover joined in the resolutions for the formation of this world-wide organization, to be known as the International Federation of Building and Public Works. Three hundred delegates, representing forty-two nations, took part in the conference.

"The new organization is designed to work for the common good of employer, employe, governments and the public," Mr. Harris explained. "The great changes in motion in all industries and the social and economic developments of recent years make it essential that some sort of international bureau be established to centralize and coordinate efforts to effect remedial action against disturbances and troubles common to all countries.

"The principal aims were formulated as follows:

"To establish constant close relations between all existing organizations in the building industry.

"To centralize all commercial, industrial, scientific and social information for the benefit of all members.

"To encourage the formation of associations of employers in all countries where they do not exist and to unite separate organizations in the same country into national federations.

"In view of the immense number of employers, the amount of capital invested and the fundamental rôle played by constructors in all ages, but more especially in recent years, to see that the building industry is given the status that it deserves. In a word, to stimulate, cordinate and collect information in all the various activities, both national and international, in the building trades.

At Work in This Country.

"The United States has not yet formally become affiliated with the international organization, although there are many groups in our country working zealously and intelligently for the good of the industry. The American delegates to the congress were so favorably impressed with what they saw and heard at the meeting and in their investigations later that it is hoped that their reports to their various associations will greatly stimulate the interest of our American builders in the international movement and lead to action along the lines laid down at the London meeting.

"The importance of bringing about improved conditions in an industry second only to agriculture, not only in its volume of annual production but in its relations to the entire economic structure, certainly is of more than local interest. The influence of the building industry upon the prosperity of other industries, direct and indirect, is greater than that of any other industry in our business life.

"The French builders, for instance, have a central organization, occupying its own building and coordinating the activities of some fifteen tributary groups covering all departments of the industry, insurance, legal and fiscal boards, compensation, research work, test of materials, hygiene, child welfare, widows' pensions, and the like. This organization, known as Fédération National de Batineat, provides facilities for the production and purchase of materials; it carries on lecture courses and even professional colleges; it operates a bank and an able publication and provides guarantee insurance, usually ten years, for the quality of building construction. The membership includes organizations of builders, architects and engineers.

"With such an association of all the interests of the building business, coupled with its participation in the work of the international organization, French builders are making very good progress in the work of raising the standards of their business and in the development of stable conditions in dealing with working hours and conditions, professional training, apprenticeship, social and economic welfare of employes, as well as in establishing credit facilities and protective measures for the benefit of the member companies."

Sees Realty Improvement.

The last half of 1939 should see an improvement of conditions in the real estate field as compared to the first six motnhs, states Irving Lee Bloch, vice president of the Long Island Title Guarantee Company.

"Readjustment of general economic factors, that have retarded realty progress, have brought many corrections." He says there has been the elimination of much that was harmful and the re-entry of more substantial phases upon which to build a solid foundation. "Credit is easier and both large and small investors have been taught the evils of wild speculation."

Amusement Facilities at Rye.

Expansion of Playland and the work of the Westchester County Park Commission are having an important part in the continued growth of Rye and the surrounding communities, in the opinion of Louis F. Blumenthal, secretary-treasurer of the Haring & Blumenthal Realty Corporation, developers of Rye Beach Gardens. Playland in 1928, its first year, drew 2,500,000 visitors and last year attracted about 4,800,000 persons. New amusement facilities, improved transportation, schools and other developments are aiding in the expansion of residential and business sections near Rye.

First Avenue Suites Renting.

Apartments in the fifteen-story and penthouse building being erected by Crystal & Crystal at 865 First Avenue are renting rapidly, according to Pease & Elliman, agents. More than 75 per cent of the suites already have been leased. The house is the fifth residential project of Crystal & Crystal in the First Avenue district.

STATE REALTY MEN MEET IN OCTOBER

COMMITTEES ARE NAMED

Large Attendance Expected at Annual Conference—Convention Clubs Being Formed.

Plans are nearing completion for the annual convention of the New York State Association of Real Estate Boards at Saranac Inn, Oct. 2, 3 and 4, according to G. William Magly of Jamaica, president.

The association is sponsoring a plan whereby delegates may arrange for a vacation, as well as for attendance at the business sessions. Convention clubs are being formed by many realty boards along the line of a Christmas or vacation club, whereby members pay a registration fee and weekly payments sufficient to defray all expenses of the trip. Such a club was organized first at Syracuse, with ten members. Plans are under way for the formation of a similar club in nearly every board in the State. Advance registration indicates that the attendance at the meeting will be large.

Mr. Magly has named Joseph F. Engel of Rochester as executive chairman of the convention committee. Ray Hofford, executive vice president of the association, will be convention manager.

Officers of the association who constitute the convention executive committee are Mr. Magly, S. N. McCain, Syracuse; Clyde W. Heer, Troy; Joseph W. Catharine, Brooklyn; Ray Hofford, Albany; Joseph F. Engel, Rochester, and the regional vice presidents, Richard T. Childs, Mineola; Arthur J. Durning, Albany; James G. Brownlow, Binghamton, and Lewis Mitchell, Buffalo.

Representatives on the State convention committee from the metropolitan district are: Jamaica, M. Paul Magly, district chairman in charge; Bronx, Henry G. Waltemade; Brooklyn, Joseph W. Catharine; Jamaica, Harry F. Sullivan; Long Island, Richard T. Childs; New York, Louis B. Dailey; Rockland, Mrs. Gale Spaulding; Staten Island, Charles W. Schutzendorf; Westchester, Edgar G. Johnson.

Joseph W. Catharine has been made chairman of the transportation committee; William J. Gilliland of Long Island, chairman of the golf committee, and Mark Graves of Albany, chairman of committee on Governor's delegates.

The number of boards and chapters belonging to the New York State Association of Real Estate Boards has been increased to sixty through the formation of the Watertown Real Estate Board, with A. J. Hibbert as president. Among the individual members added recently was Milton Rosenbluh of this city.

REAL ESTATE VALUES.

The Many Factors That Enter Into Realty Appraisals.

The basic thing that determines land value is the number of people who want the same type of ground and who enter into competitive bidding for its use.

The amount of bidding depends upon the available supply and demand for this particular type of ground.

Where the supply of this type of ground is limited, the bidding gets stronger and values go up, while if there is an abundance of this same type of ground, the bidding is less active and values are lower.

Land is valuable in large cities in proportion to its ability to return income, pleasure and service to its owners. The number of people who make a livelihood in or near a city, the ease and comfort with which they can reach their work from their homes, the chances for recreation in a given locality and the advantages offered for culture and education.

The character of governmental service, such as law enforcement, police and fire protection, all have bearing upon the desirability and value of a home. This is because land having all these attributes is limited in quantity in proportion to the number of people who want all these advantages.

Then land value is profoundly affected by the chances it offers for making a living at or near it. People will crowd into a small area and pay more for the privilege of living there if that area holds greater chances of gain, and in a greater variety of fields.

An example of this is the Chicago Loop district, or the Times Square section of New York. People will pay more for such locations because they expect to make enough more by being there to more than justify the added cost.

Cities located where domestic and foreign trade may be carried on, or where large industries may be developed, enjoy a constant competitive bidding for the use of lands and values are consequently high.

MADISON AVENUE SUITES.

New Eighteen-Story Apartment House at Ninety-sixth Street.

Modern apartment house construction is extending northward on Madison Avenue, points out H. S. Hillyer & Co., agents for the eighteen-story and penthouse building being erected at 49 East Ninety-sixth Street, northeast corner of Madison Avenue. The building, planned by Thomas W. Lamb, will be ready for Fall occupancy and stands at the northerly limit of modern multi-family homes on the avenue, near the crest of a hill extending from Ninety-third to Ninety-eighth Street.

The house will contain seventy-five suites ranging in size from three to nine rooms, with no two floor layouts alike. The four upper floors have apartments of six to eight rooms with terraces. The penthouse is a nine-room duplex.

New York Farm Sales.

E. A. Strout has sold the sixty-seven-acre farm on Shed's Corner Road, Georgetown, N. Y., for Mrs. Cleva Halstead, to Ernest Kelly of Brooklyn. He also sold 115 acres near New Berlin, N. Y., for C. Axtell, to George L. Englehart, of Watertown, Conn.; a tract near Mount Kisco, for A. M. Findlay, to D. M. Bendell of New Dorp; a farm of seventy acres near Berkshire, N. Y., for Mrs. F. Legg, to Mrs. F. Sokolowski of Harrison, N. J.; also fourteen acres near Unadilla, N. Y., for Frank Van Cott to Mrs. Hannah Ashe and 100 acres near Guilford, N. Y., for R. D. and A. E. Guidal of Flushing.

HOLDS EASEMENT CLOUD ON TITLE

FOUND NOT "MARKETABLE"

Sale Contract Voided Despite Fact That Purchaser Knew of the Encumbrance.

In a suit involving a marketable title where there was a visible easement known to the purchaser, the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts has recently handed down a decision in the case of Queenin against Black. The action was brought by a buyer of real estate to recover a down payment, the contract providing that the seller should convey a marketable title. The title was rejected by the vendee on the ground that there was a private easement in the form of a driveway running across the premises which was not mentioned directly or indirectly in the contract of sale.

The highest court of Massachusetts took the same position as has been taken by the New York Court of Appeals in such disputes, and held that although the easement in question had been known to the purchaser at the time the contract was made, he was entitled to reject title upon the ground that it constituted a defect making the title unmarketable.

In a New York case involving a similar question, Judge Cardozo in the Court of Appeals rejected the contention that legal title to the property involved in the case could not be upheld because the encumbrance was known at the time of the sale, and pointed out that "the value of covenances of title would be seriously impaired if their operation could be limited by notice, actual or constructive, of the presence of a hostile right."

Salient Points in Opinion.

The Massachusetts decision, written by Justice Field, said:

"The agreement of the parties was embodied in the written contract, and any understanding or agreement outside it, made before or at the same time, was immaterial. This contract cannot be varied by evidence in the form of conversations between the parties and their agents or otherwise tending to show that the parties knew that the premises were subject to the right of way and understood that conveyance was to be made subject thereto, and a special finding of the jury to that effect stands no better. The principle of substantive law known as the parol evidence rule forbids.

"This rule was applied in Rubenstein vs. Hershorn, where the contract called for a title which was 'good and clear,' 'free from all encumbrances,' and there was a visible passageway over the property subject to a right of way, and the testimony as to the purchaser's knowledge of the existence of this passageway was excluded.

"Though there is authority elsewhere for such an exception even in the case of a private easement, it is not in accord with our decisions, and there is considerable authority in other jurisdictions against it or limiting the exception to easements which are public.

"The contract in the present case calls expressly for a 'marketable title.' This term arose in equity, and means a title which equity requires a purchaser to take.

"We see no adequate reason for reading into the assurance of freedom from encumbrances contained in an agreement to convey a 'marketable title' an exception of visible servitudes affecting the physical condition of the property and known to the purchaser which would not be read into a contract which in specific terms calls for a title 'free from all incumbrances.'

"The defendant takes no advantage from the doctrine that where a contract is silent as to the title which is to be shown by the vendor; that is, where it is an 'open contract,' a good title is implied, but the implication may be rebutted by parol evidence, though an express requirement of good title cannot be varied by such evidence.

"Neither the findings nor the evidence which supports them tends to show 'waiver,' so-called, meaning a modification of the defendants' obligation under the contract, for both speak as of a time prior to or contemporaneous with the making of the contract and not subsequent thereto. The defendants do not contend that by reason of any mutual mistake the understanding of the parties was not embodied in the contract."

FORECLOSURE SALES.

Not Always Due to Income Failure, Says F. M. McCurdy.

Foreclosure sales do not always give a fair picture of the true conditions in the present realty market, states Frank M. McCurdy. He explains that it is erroneous to believe that bankruptcy and foreclosure auctions are always caused by the failure of the building for sale to produce sufficient income to meet its liens and other obligations.

"I have known of several cases," says Mr. McCurdy, "where foreclosures have been necessitated solely because rental income has been diverted to other purposes than to the paying of mortgage amortization, taxes, repair and other legitimate demands. In other words, the owner has been using the income from his building's rental for purposes totally outside of the demands created by construction financing.

"Unfortunately, the foreclosure sale is looked upon as an indication that the particular unit for sale is not able to produce an income sufficient to meet its obligations. Such a viewpoint is not only faulty in its conclusions but capable of creating harm to general real estate conditions."

L. I. Radio Building Contract.

A contract has been awarded by Skinner & Cook of New York, contractors, for building material supplies, including lumber, mason materials and cement to be used in the addition to the Radio Corporation of America's broadcasting station at Bellmore, L. I., to the Nassau-Suffolk Lumber and Supply Corporation. The contract is said to be one of the largest of its kind awarded in Long Island territory this year.

Never before such sensational innovations in apartment living!

Where Else in New York Can You Duplicate Even a FEW of these Marvelous Features?

PRECEDENTS are smashed. Past performances have gone into the discard. In designing London Terrace, the owners have leaped years ahead to provide smart New Yorkers with facilities so complete, so gratifying, so entirely new and unusual as to have instituted a startling innovation in housing ideals.

One look at London Terrace and you will revise your entire conception of the smart way to live. One inquiry about rentals and you will be amazed to learn that all this astounding luxury and convenience can be yours at no increase in cost over what you may be paying for just an ordinary apartment.

In London Terrace:

ONE ROOM APARTMENTS have real kitchens, dressing rooms large enough to hold wardrobes and in-a-door beds, beautifully tiled baths and surprisingly spacious closets.

LARGER SUITES are really de luxe arrangements of living room, chamber, kitchen, foyer and bath with separate built-in shower forming the most complete and satisfying medium-sized homes in existence.

PENTHOUSES have all the light and airiness of real country homes and are completely surrounded by huge terraces, with a special elevator available for the use of your guests on evenings when you entertain.

THE GARDENS occupy a central area as large as many city parks and just as beautiful. Trees, shrubs, playing fountains, a quiet place to walk or read are just outside your door or window!

A GYMNASIUM AND SWIMMING POOL, a roof solarium, all modern, all fully equipped, will provide unusual and especially convenient recreational facilities for healthful living.

AN EXCELLENT RESTAURANT and Private Dining Rooms for entertaining will be delightfully attractive.

HIGH-GRADE STORES right in the building, reached by house telephone, also will be visited without the necessity of stepping outside in inclement weather.

In London Terrace:

A PACKAGE DELIVERY SERVICE will bring parcels from these stores and outside sources directly to your apartment by uniformed attendants.

VALET AND LAUNDRY SERVICES operate on an efficient 24-hour schedule. Vacuum Cleaner Service is at your instant disposal. A House Repair Service takes care of necessary adjustments and replacements immediately.

MAIDS are available, just as you need them, for hourly, daily, weekly or monthly employment.

RESIDENT DOCTORS AND DENTISTS will watch over your health if you care to avail yourself of their services.

LONDON "BOBBIES" at the door, and a 24-hour day and night patrol inside and outside the building insure 100% police protection.

ALL GAS for cooking and refrigeration is furnished tenants without charge.

A PRIVATE GARAGE with attendants to call for and deliver your car at your own door, will be a day and night convenience.

WEST 14TH STREET SHOWING ACTIVITY

Several Business Buildings and Transit Lines Are Being Constructed.

NEW FREIGHT FACILITIES

New York Central and Inland Union Terminals Aid Development of the Section.

New business buildings and improved transit facilities under way or planned for the section centring in Fourteenth Street and Eighth Avenue are destined to bring a wide structural and commercial transformation between Eighth and Tenth Avenue, Twelfth to Eighteenth Street, according to the County Trust Company, which has just completed a survey of the developments in progress there.

"In recent years, from a region of nondescript business and residential character, the section has taken on new life with plans for the Eighth Avenue and Fourteenth Street subway lines," the trust company points out.

"At the intersection of Eighth Avenue and Fourteenth Street a financial district is already established, several large banks and trust companies being located there; the County Trust Company of New York, in a newly completed twenty-story bank and office building, at the northeast corner; the Chatham and Phenix National Bank and Trust Company, at the southwest corner, and the New York Savings Bank, at the northwest corner.

"The removal of the offices of the Port of New York Authority from 75 West Street to the County Trust Company Building, where it occupies six floors, emphasizes the transcending importance, now and in the future, of this west side area. It is well located in reference to the several major building projects to which the Port Authority is committed.

"These offices are almost opposite the projected fourteen-story inland union freight terminal, bounded by Eighth and Ninth Avenues, Fifteenth and Sixteenth Streets, they are about midway between the Holland Tunnel and the projected vehicular tunnel from Weehawken to Thirty-eighth Street, and then under the East River to Queens, where it will connect with a new commercial highway to and across Brooklyn.

Eliminates Traffic Dangers.

"These vehicular tunnels will eliminate the traffic danger to the economic life of midtown as well as promote a well rounded commercial condition and make Queens, Brooklyn and the metropolitan area of New Jersey more vital parts of the Port of New York. The section will be easily accessible to the Thirty-eighth Street vehicular tunnel, and the new west side freight road and warehouse system of the New York Central Railroad, now under way. Eleventh Avenue, now surfaced with the west side freight road of the New York Central, will be reconditioned as a wide trucking thoroughfare.

"Several large sites for private commercial enterprises have already been acquired in the Eighth Avenue-Fourteenth Street section, and other large sites in the neighborhood are being examined and considered by prospective purchasers. The huge new freight terminal of the New York Central, to cost $15,000,000, will be not far away, at Clarkson, Spring, Washington and West Street. This may cause a northward movement of the wholesale produce district.

"Within this area of great business and industrial possibilities is Gansevoort Market, bounded by Little West Twelfth Street, Washington Street, Tenth Avenue and Gansevoort Street. The proposed Fourteenth Street vehicular tunnel will not be started until the Thirty-eighth Street tunnel is completed, but it is the definite purpose of the Port Authority to construct the route.

"Part of the section south of Fourteenth Street is well adapted for reimprovement with office and mercantile buildings owing to the exceptional light afforded by large triangular public spaces, such as at the intersection of Eighth Avenue, Horatio Street and West Fourth Street; the intersection of Thirteenth, Eighth Avenue and Greenwich Avenue, which form Jackson Square, and the open space where Eighth Avenue, Greenwich Avenue and Horatio Street meet.

"The sites of the old buildings fronting on all of these light and air centres, together with their easy accessibility, are now too valuable for the type and size of the buildings thereon, in the opinion of many who are well informed on the possibilities in light of the evolution of the Eighth Avenue-Fourteenth Street section.

"There is room for modern improvements on Fourteenth Street, between Eighth and Ninth Avenues, where old three and four-story buildings prevail, as well as on the same thoroughfare between Seventh and Eighth Avenues, and on the latter avenue north of Fourteenth Street.

"Serving the Eighth Avenue-Fourteenth Street section will be a large postoffice, for parcel post use, now in course of construction on the block bounded by Tenth and Eleventh Avenues, Twenty-ninth and Thirtieth Streets."

MARKETABLE TITLE DEFINED BY COURT

JOSEPH P. DAY DEFENDANT

Rules Willingness of Title Company to Insure Does Not Make It "Marketable."

An interesting decision on the question of a marketable title has been handed down by the Appellate Division in Brooklyn in a suit of the New York Investors, Inc., against the Manhattan Beach Bathing Parks Corporation and Joseph P. Day. The court reversed a judgment filed in Kings County on Sept. 4 last directing the corporation to perform a contract of purchase from the plaintiff of the premises described in the complaint and directing Mr. Day to execute a guarantee of the performance by the defendant corporation of its contract with the plaintiff.

The Appellate Division in a decision written by Justice Tompkins in which all the judges concurred except Justice Young, dismissed the complaint against both defendants and gave judgment to the defendant corporation against the plaintiff on its counter-claim for $25,000 as the amount of its payment on account of the contract, with the interest and the amount paid for the title search. The court made the general rule that a vendee need not take an unmarketable title, although a title company is willing to issue a policy.

Justice Tompkins said that an agreement made Jan. 18, 1929, by which the defendant corporation was to buy the premises subject to easements which included street opening proceedings, pending or proposed, and subject to any rights of the city or State, in any part of the property lying within the limits of Sea Breeze Avenue.

The court said:

Court Explains Case.

"The defendants denied in their answers the allegation in the complaint that the plaintiff agreed to convey on Feb. 18, 1923, by bargain and sale deed the fee simple of said premises subject to certain specified mortgages, leases and agreements, and also subject to the exceptions stated in the contract, and also denied the allegation in the complaint that the plaintiff was, at the time fixed for the closing, namely, Feb. 18, 1929, and still is ready, willing and able to perform the agreement and deliver a deed in accordance with the terms thereof.

The defendants in their answers and counter-claim allege that there were existing public and private easements and rights in other parties in that portion of the premises extending over the north half of Sea Breeze Avenue, being a forty-foot strip, and being the southerly portion of the premises under contract of conveyance. This strip the defendants claim is a part of a legally opened and established street which has never been legally closed. Other claims of the defendants respecting misrepresentations as to the condition and location of the building and encroachments of the building were abandoned at the trial."

Justice Tompkins refers to correspondence with the Title Guarantee and Trust Company in course of which the attorneys for the defendants wrote the plaintiff as follows:

"The map shows that the north line of the water grant ran diagonally through a corner of the property west of Calm Street and through the middle of the property east of Calm Street. Furthermore, you claim, as I understand it, an avulsion of the land up to where Sea Breeze Avenue is now supposed to stop. If so, you claim that the high-water line was back that far. Consider this in connection with their above objections and also consider the fact that there is a private owner on Sea Breeze Avenue as it now exists who probably at all times had an easement permitting him to go over the bed of Sea Breeze Avenue to the water wherever it might be. Can you get the title company to remove these objections, or will your company, outright, guarantee that the purchaser may get a new mortgage, such as he may need, at any time for his purpose?"

On Feb. 15, 1929, the title company wrote the defendants' attorneys stating that these objections set up by the title company would be covered by an exception in the policy of insurance excepting all public easements, if any, and all public rights, if any, of the city of New York in the north half of former Sea Breeze Avenue, and that the word "private" in said exception had been omitted therefrom, and that the instalment assessments for the grading of Sea Breeze Avenue up to 1928 appear on the books of the city of New York as having been paid.

The title company in the same communication stated as follows: "We assume that your client having contracted to purchase the property in good faith is anxious to have a title policy which will conform as nearly as possible to the terms of the contract. With this idea in mind we have endeavored to eliminate from our report on the title all exceptions which we consider to be immaterial or could be safely disregarded or waived."

Stating that he did not agree that the defendant corporation was required to take such title as the Title Gurantee and Trust Company would approve, subject to the exceptions provided for in the contract, "regardless of the marketability of the title itself," Justice Tompkins said:

"The seller was obligated to convey the absolute fee of the premises free from all encumbrances except such as are stated and provided for in the contract, and in addition the purchaser was only obligated to accept the title if it was one that the Title Guarantee and Trust Company would approve and insure subject to the exceptions set forth in the said agreement. The provision in a contract for a title company policy is merely an added safeguard for the benefit solely of the purchaser, which is provided at the expense of the purchaser, and which the purchaser may, if he cares to do so, waive.

Validity of Title.

"Under the pleadings the burden of proving marketable title subject to the exceptions set forth in the contract was on the plaintiff and this burden was not met. Under the contract the conveyance was to be made subject to the rights, if any, of the City and, or State of New York in any portion of the premises described therein, but was not subject to private easements, and it was incumbent upon the plaintiff, when the marketable title alleged in the complaint was denied by the answer, to establish a marketable title as a part of its case and to prove that there were no private easements such as defendants alleged over the premises agreed to be conveyed.

"The mere statement by the title company that in its opinion there could be no private easements in a public street was an opinion merely and did not affect the marketability of the title, and the title company's statement that it endeavored to eliminate from its report on the title exceptions which it considered to be immaterial or in its opinion could be safely desregarded or waived had no bearing on the question of the marketability of the title, nor was it sufficient to compel the defendant corporation to accept a title with defects other than those subject to which title was agreed to be taken.

"The purchaser is not bound to buy a lawsuit between himself and the title company or other parties having or claiming private easements, and the claims by defendants that there are private owners who have rights in Sea Breeze Avenue has not been disproved, but, on the contrary, are established by the proofs.

"The title company refused to commit itself as to the legal marketability, stating that the defendants would have to draw their own conclusions, but, nevertheless, was willing to issue an insurance policy for the purchase price, in accordance with what it interpreted the contract to mean.

"The northerly half of Sea Breeze Avenue, over which the defendants claim there are private easements, and which is a part of the property under contract of sale and which was never legally closed, is on the oceanfront of the property and adjoins the boardwalk. Without immediate access to the boardwalk the value of the property would be very greatly depreciated.

"Sea Breeze Avenue, after having been laid out in 1891, and placed on the city map, was paved, curbed, graded and flagged, and assessments were levied and paid by private owners for nineteen years. It was never legally closed and abutting owners have rights in it.

"One standard required by the contract as to title insurance was technically met by the title company agreeing to insure in accordance with the terms of the contract, but the other standard as to the marketability of the title was not met. The burden was on the plaintiff, inasmuch as the marketability was asserted in the complaint and denied by the answer, to prove by a fair preponderance of the evidence that a marketable title was tendered. This not having been done, the judgment should be reversed."

BEAUX ARTS TENANTS.

Business Women Comprise Half of the Occupants.

More than 50 per cent of residents of the twin Beaux Arts Apartments at 307 and 310 East Forty-fourth Street are women, and approximately 80 per cent of them are identified with business, the professions or the arts, points out John I. Conroy, residential manager for Douglas L. Elliman & Co., managers for the building. The "career woman" he considers is becoming an outstanding factor in apartment house design and management.

"Raymond Hood and Kenneth Murchison, who designed the twin apartments for the George A. Fuller Company," says Mr. Conroy, "recognized this factor when they devoted roughly three-fourths of the floor space to single-room apartments and then made each a complete living unit—living room, bedroom, dressing room, bath, kitchenette, electric refrigerator, and even provided incinerator chutes.

"The 'career woman' demands practically all the freedom from housekeeping obligations that men require, but still wishes to retain the facilities for small-scale housekeeping, not only as a measure of economy, but as a form of relaxation. Thus, in addition to a central location, near her office or shop, she wants maid service, valet service and restaurant service. But she also wishes to be able to either dispense with these or supplement them with her own efforts on occasion."

Advance in Home Ownership.

Plans for promotion of home ownership and home modernization, which lost heavily in the speculative years of 1928 and 1929, are rapidly regaining their rightful place in the economic business picture, where they are now regarded as the soundest type of investment procedure, points out H. H. Tinkham, president of the Nassau-Suffolk Lumber and Supply Corporation.

"I notice," he adds, "a distinct trend of money away from the commonly accepted speculative fields, toward these more conservative and yet highly profitable phases of needed residential construction."

Home Remodeling Contest.

Time for submitting entries in the home modernization contest being conducted by the Railroad Cooperative Building and Loan Association has been extended to Aug. 16, according to George A. Martin, president. Awards amounting to $200 will be made in the contest, which is intended to stimulate the improvement and beautification of homes.

State Valuations.

The assessed valuation of property in New York State increased more $1,500,000,000 during the past year, according to an official report from Albany, the greater part of the increase coming from boosts in valuation in New York City, Nassau, Suffolk and Westchester counties.

PLENTY OF SHADE AND SUNLIGHT.

THE LOCATION—In Greenacres—that beautiful development, the pride of Westchester—two blocks from the Bronx Parkway, midway between Hartsdale and White Plains.

THE HOUSE—New, modern in every appointment, brick to the second story, white clapboard above and roofed with slate. A tiled vestibule entry, a big, handsome, sunny living room, 15 by 30 feet, yes, 30 feet long, with six windows. Then a sun room, 12 by 16 feet, which can be made like an open porch without dismantling—a dining room with southeast exposure, and that pride of the housewife

THE KITCHEN—It is tiled and has two closets, a breakfast nook that disappears when not in use, a six-foot porcelain sink—plenty of cabinet room—and a splendid gas stove, ready for service. The maid's room has a tiled bath and is also on the main floor, overlooking a small service porch and terrace.

AN UNUSUAL FEATURE—The master's bedroom is 30 feet long, so designed as to give, BESIDES the space for twin beds and dressers, a REAL UPSTAIRS LIVING ROOM. This room has two closets and connecting bath in colored tile—not the giddy kind, but a delicate rose tint. The other bath is in buff, and there are three more large light bedrooms, with cross-ventilation. There is a large attic with stairs. The house has a full outfit of copper wire screens.

PRICE—The best bargain in Greenacres. It's only $27,000. We recommend it as a buy and as an honestly built house.

PASTEUR FARM AID IN TERMS OF MONEY

Late Dr. Tuffier Said Scientist's Benefits to Our Agriculture Were Huge.

QUOTES FEDERAL FIGURES

Eminent Surgeon Compares French Debt to Us and Farm Benefactions.

PARIS, June 12.—In an interview with Mme. Tuffier, widow of Dr. Theodore Tuffier, internationally eminent French surgeon, she submitted the text of an article partially prepared by her husband before his death, dealing with a comparison between the debt owed by France to the United States and the amount which has been saved to the agricultural interests of America because of the contribution to medical science of a Frenchman—Louis Pasteur. It was Pasteur's discoveries, Dr. Tuffier pointed out, which enabled the farmers to stay the onslaught of anthrax and other diseases which yearly accounted for a tremendous loss in cattle. The statement, completed by Mrs. Tuffier, reads:

"France owes milliards of dollars to America. This is definitely settled and there is nothing more to be said about it. I have a particular consideration for the American people, whom I have often visited; I admire their government and their President, whom I know and highly esteem, and whose charitable activities during the war I regard with appreciation.

"I accept with gratitude the reduction of half of our debt which was offered to us by the United States, and I assure them of the gratitude of the French people.

"Now, if you look into the past of France, you will find that we have given, I say given, to all the powers on earth, and in the case of the United States of America—a substantial fortune much greater than that which the United States claim from us.

"The genius of Pasteur, the great scope of the material value of his discoveries and the generosity of this Frenchman have never been weighed against actual expenses. I will put aside the sentimental and moral question and speak of 'dollars.' Let us see what Pasteur, and he alone, has given to the United States. Among the infinite consequences of the work of the founder of the 'microbiologie' we shall consider only the repercussions which it has had from the standpoint of rearing domestic animals.

"The value of the leased cattle of the United States varies. There is, however, a certain fact, namely, that both the number of cattle and the value per head have a continuous tendency to increase. If we take one of the first official statistical reports made in the United States, for example, that of 1875, we notice that 99,963,950 heads of animals represented at that time the lump sum of $1,618,011,321. If we take the statistics of one of the last years, that of 1925 for example, we find that 172,655,789 heads of animals represent a value of $5,174,796,922. We see then that if the number of animals has almost doubled, the value in dollars has more than tripled.

"It would be fastidious to report the annual statistics of the number and corresponding value of the leased cattle. Therefore we will give only an average taken from the 'Encyclopedia of American Agriculture,' Vol. 4 (1917), for the demonstration of our statement.

"The value of cattle in the United States, writes L. H. Bailey, is estimated at an average of four and one-half milliard dollars for about 200,000,000 heads of cattle.

"It is particularly interesting to note that the saving of one-half of 1 per cent of the stock would give an economy of $22,500,000 per year. Further on we shall see that this percentage has been largely surpassed, due to the pasteurian discoveries. Stiles, who also gives us a similar account, states that the value of leased cattle is $511,654,000, with deaths from infectious diseases averaging from 4 to 5 per cent. This represents then $20,000,000 to $25,000,000. The reduction of 1 per cent would give us there an economy from $4,000,000 to $5,000,000. As these diseases are due to the presence of the 'anaerobies pathogenes' microbes, the author infers the necessity of prophylactic measures.

"According to an official report from the Annuary of the Department of Agriculture of the United States for 1915, the loss from diseases for thirty years can be estimated to nearly $212,000,000 yearly, detailed as follows:

Texas fever and tick	40,000,000
Tuberculosis	25,000,000
Epizootic abortion	20,000,000
Blackleg	6,000,000
Anthrax	1,500,000
Scab of sheep and cattle	4,600,000
Glanders of horses	5,000,000
Other infectious diseases	22,000,000
Parasitic diseases	5,000,000

Economy Arrived At.

"In the various reports, published largely, according to official documents from the United States, and which we have examined, we unfortunately find nothing but part statements on the state of the leased cattle during epidemic periods before or after the application of the immunization methods derived from the discoveries of Pasteur. Despite the deficiency with which these publications present this point of view, they point out in a very striking way the great economy arrived at in the country due to the genius of Pasteur.

"Let us be allowed to mention some of the diseases, the losses they caused and the economy realized. These facts are mentioned in dollars.

"Here are the figures taken from the Bureau of Animal Industry for 1897-98, when the first vaccine was distributed. Two hundred thousand doses were delivered—127,369 animals were vaccinated. Before the vaccination period the loss of animals averaged 14 per cent; it decreased to 0.54 per cent after the vaccination. These percentages are confirmed by statistics published later (Norgaard, Salmon, &c.). According to Norgaard, preventive vaccination for blackleg has produced an economy of $250,000 annually.

"This figure of $250,000 seems to me insufficient, because if, as we have just pointed out, the annual loss due to blackleg were still $6,000,000, the proportion 14-0.54 would be, for the period before vaccination, $155,000,000 of annual loss caused only from blackleg.

"Hog Cholera.—This disease existed in Indiana (Butting) since 1840; in 1886 it was estimated that 80 per cent of hogs died from this infection. The State of Iowa alone, writes Schweinitz, had annually a loss of $15,000,000 from hog cholera. By using the 'traitment serotherapique,' writes this author, an economy of $11,000,000 is shown. As the loss for all the United States in 1898 was nearly $100,000,000, we can then multiply this economy by six. In 1909 Eichorn estimated losses caused by this disease at $15,000,000, or a decrease of $85,000,000 for the United States.

"In 1895, 92.3 per cent of hogs died of diseases. In 1922, 54.4 per cent, with a maximum of 127 per thousand in 1896 and a minimum of 41 per thousand in 1911.

"He considers the annual economy realized by the 'prophylactic process' reaching 2,250,000 hogs, representing a value of $20,000,000.

Gain From Immunization.

"Texas fever, which represented a loss of 90 per cent and caused huge ravages in the cattle regions, has now been changed to 90 per cent of gain, due to active immunization by vaccination.

"The losses by this disease are estimated at $40,000,000, according to Salmon, and the economy due to immunization is estimated at $36,000,000.

"Epizootic Abortion: This disease is commonly met with in mares causing 70 to 80 per cent of deaths. Preventative vaccination has given very satisfactory results as shown in 91.2 per cent of cases (Hadiry). The annual loss of horses by infectious diseases in general decreased, due to phophylactic measures, from 22.3 per 1,000 in 1895 to 16 per 1,000 in 1922, and according to a statement from Waters 150,000 more horses are saved yearly than thirty years ago.

"In admitting a value of $50 for each animal, we have an economy annually of $7,500,000. In fact, as this author remarks, this amelioration increases every year.

"Among other infectious diseases, we can also mention the 'cattle plague' which, according to Salmon, causes 90 to 95 per cent of the deaths in cattle, and that this has been decreasing by vaccination to 30 per cent.

"Glanders, anthrax, scab of sheep and other infectious diseases cause an annual loss which could be estimated at nearly $40,000,000, and which immunization methods have reduced and are still reducing considerably.

"Considering only the few diseases and official figures mentioned above an economy of $65,000,000 per year is shown. And by stating that the prophylactic process and pasteurian methods have been used for forty years we have an economy of more than $2,500,000.

"In order to complete this we should add agriculture, and the immense economical movement introduced by pasteurian methods in the industry of conserved food: industry completely renovated and amplified to a degree that could not have been foreseen, and which returns to American commerce in milliards of dollars every year.

"Although our statistical proof is limited to some infectious diseases in cattle and represents only an average, one can nevertheless see the enormous economy in the United States, thanks to Pasteur.

Saving to Agriculture.

"At the centenary of Pasteur, in 1922, several orators (Leclainche, Barrier and others) in speaking of his work from a veterinary point of view, have all revealed that 'the Illustrious Master has saved milliards of dollars to agriculture.' 'No fortune would have equaled his had he had the idea, of course legitimate, to make the best of his discoveries. When it was suggested to him; 'in France,' he would answer, 'Scientific men would think it demeriting to behave thus.'

"Pasteur has presented this economy as a gift to the United States, without any royalty or warrant.

"I do not intend going any further. If, however, you wanted to consider the value of human life in the United States, and see the list of deaths from diphtheria and typhoid fever before and after Pasteur, you would reach a phenomenal result. As for the pain and suffering which accompany all these plagues, they are of a much higher nature than can be reckoned in dollars.

"The opening of the Panama Canal could never have been done had not doctors used the pasteurian methods for fighting the marsh fever, yellow fever, &c.

"I will repeat in one word that the averaging annuity to be paid by France to the United States is $65,000,000 during sixty-two years.

"These are facts frankly put to light and with the sole aim of establishing the truth. I have horror of beggary on any pretext whatsoever. I would never have published this before the debt and reparations questions had been settled. It gives us, it seems to me, the right to raise our heads before the mountain of gold that they show us.

"I have submitted this argument before several of my colleagues from the United States, and one of them has taken it upon himself before me, in France, to state these same conclusions before the Municipal Council in Paris.

"If any country in the world has the same rights to this honor, let that country say so, and we will yield it the honor."
